Prof. Lugger's Report.

He Talks About the Blight and Diseases of Wheat.

Otto Lugger, state entomologist, has made a report to the governor. On the whole his report as to the condition of affairs among the wheat growers of the Red River valley is not encouraging. In Otter Tail county he found that the wheat had been injured more by rust than by frost. The rust was caused by a series of very warm and sultry days. In Polk county Mr. Lugger found about 85 per cent of the crop utterly worthless. Here rust and frost combined to do the damage. The sowing was twice interrupted by rains, the first two sowings failing to result in any good grain; the crop coming from the third sowing was so badly bitten by frost on Aug. 14, 15, and 16, that it was not fit for food for hogs. Wheat sown on sandy soil matured better than that sown upon richer ground, for the reason that in the former case the moisture in the growing berries would not become excessive. In Kittson county rust and frost combined to do such damage that in many cases the the crops could not pay the expense of harvesting. Mr. Lugger says that the farmers who lost their crops are in a deplorable condition. they have no money with which to buy seed, and they will be compelled to abandon their farms unless assisted. The report suggests that the state loan them seed wheat for next season.

Chopped Feed.

Farm, Stock and Home.

It costs money to misuse a milch cow.

Isn't feeding a dry cow all winter sort 'o drying on the purse?

It is none too early to begin to plan for the next crop campaign.

Politeness pays in the cow stable. A gentle man gets more milk than a harsh one.

Nearly 35,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine were made in the United States in 1888.

Sheep breeders in the Northwest all report an extremely active demand for good sheep.

If one is ashamed of his occupation, the occupation will be very likely to return the compliment.

A large percentage of farmers are still industriously "going out of cattle;" a few wise ones are staying in, and even increasing their herds.

If the pen is mightier than the sword, then the lead pencil is mightier than a Krupp gun, when used by a farmer in making notes and keeping accounts.

While laboring to decrease rail rates, interest on money, elevator's dividends and the extortions of trusts, don't cease laboring to increase the butter product of the cow from 100 to 300 pounds a year.

A correspondent asks for the most effectual way to clean up his farm. We may not understand just what he means, but would suggest that drinking plenty of whisky will clean up almost any kind of business, and it might do the same for a farm.

We loan money to pay up railroad lands.

Frosted Wheat as Seed.

Orange Judd Farmer.

How far frosted wheat is safely available as seed for next season's crop is just now a question of vital importance in a very wide area of the Northwest. In the fifteen or twenty counties of Dakota and Minnesota, lying along the Red River and its tributaries, with an estimated wheat crop last year of something like 45,000,000 bushels, it is very unlikely that there will be much over 20,000,000 bushels of marketable wheat of this year's crop, and a good deal even of that will be considerably frozen. In Manitoba, where the Fall rainfall was more limited and growth scarcely so rank, the proportion of loss will be less on the whole, but one of the very best wheat-growing sections, the Central Souris District, is very badly hit.

EXPERIMENTS TO BE MADE.

Experiments for the purpose of testing the value of frozen wheat as seed, will be simultaneously tried on the experimental farm of Minnesota, Dakota, and at Ottawa for the benefit of Manitoba, during the Winter, to test in the first place the vitality of frozen wheat. Test samples from the affected districts will be sorted out into half a dozen grades, from No 1 hard down to badly frosted. A fixed number of grains of each sort will be sown under glass, and their vitality carefully noted. When the natural growing season comes on in April corresponding samples will be sown in the open field, and harvested. The final result of this latter portion of the test will not of course be available as a guide to the sowing of next season's crop, but it will still be very valuable in showing how far experiments under glass are reliable as a guide to outside practice.

IDENTICAL SOIL AND SEASON IMPORTANT FACTORS.

I have been on the run of this testing process for years, and my experince leads me to the conclusion that it takes a very wide-awake man to make reliable observations in this particular department. Unless both soil and season are identically the same in the test plat as in the section of country where the bulk is to be sown and grown, the test will be a very poor guide as to the prospects of the ultimate crop. Even the test under glass ought to be made in almost the same soil or it will prove defective. In support of my opinion that there is quite as much in the soil and climate and season as in the seed, let me refer to an experimental farm at Guelph, Ontario, in 1886, with frosted wheat of the former year's growth, supplied by Capt. Clark, the Dominion Grain Inspector at Winnipeg. The tabulated results of these experiments are a caution to "scientific" observers. Out of fifteen samples tested I select the most prominent examples:

No 4. Badly frosted, showed in 8 days 30 per cent, germinated.

No. 5. No. 3 frosted, showed in 8 days 56 per cent, germinated.

No. 8. Feed wheat, showed in 8 days 52 per cent, germinated.

No. 9. No. 1. Hard, showed in 8 days 66 per cent, germinated.

No. 11. No. 2 frosted, extra showed in 8 days 42 per cent, germinated.

No. 13. No. 2 Hard, showed in 8 days 52 per cent, germinated.

No. 15. No. 1 Hard, showed in 8 days 6 per cent, germinated.

The man who selected these samples knew his business. Yet we have two samples of best hard red Fyfe wheat (Nos. 9 and 15) with 30 per cent, difference in germinating power. No. 8 "feed wheat," that means wheat so much frozen that it could only be sold for chicken feed or chopping, makes 52 per cent, the same as No. 13, which graded 2 Hare, and was 10 per cent, better than No. 11, 2 frested extra, which means that it was worth more than double the price of No. 8. The same seeds sown next Summer in the experimental plats made all about an equally poor return; that from No. 9, the best Manitoba hard wheat, may be taken as an example. The yield from this was "straw thick on the ground, uneven and short; small heads and but little grain."

WHEAT SICKENS IN THE GLARE OF THE LIGHT OF SCIENCE

This pitiful return from good seed sown on the "model farm," of Ontario, and there does not appear to have been much difference between the best and the worst seeds in their ultimate result. The Red Fyfe of the Red River Valley, whether sound or frozen, seems to get very sick when expermented on by scientists on model farms in a strange country. Just when the professor was incubating over the samples, I was knocking round on a buckboard among the discouraged homesteaders who were being offered 25 cents or less for wheat, which today is freely bought at 80 cents. Next week I shall tell what I know of crops raised from seed often so bad that it was hardly worth hauling to market. They had to sow it; they could not afford to buy anything better, though some did buy a little first-class seed, and sowed the rest of their land with their chicken feed at 10 to 25 cents. I am glad to say they had better luck than the botanical professor.

A Senatorial Reminiscence.

Northfield News.

Mr. E. S. Youmans, of Winona, brings out an interesting reminiscence of the senatorial contest of six years ago, in the shape of an extract from the St. Paul Pioneer Press of Feb. 2d, 1883. It is as follows:

"Much worse things might have happened than the election of D. M. Sabin to the senate. He owes his election largely to personal qualities, which stamp him as a natural leader of men. One thing at least will be conceded, even by those who most deprecate his election, and that is that no more capable representative of the general business interests of the state could have been elected than D. M. Sabin. He has certain attractive and popular personal qualities, which are often more conductive to a successful public career than the highest order of intellectual endowments. He has the personal magnetism of a frank, forceful, generous, large hearted man."

In the Winona Republican of Saturday Mr. Youmans makes some vigorous comments on this text, which were doubtless prompted by the recent editorials of the Pioneer Press demanding that a "statesman" and later that a "business man is wanted." Mr. Youmans says:

"The Italics are my own. This appreciative estimate of Senator Sabin was not the exuberant gushing of a partisan elated by a victory, but the spontaneous tribute of a journal that had been earnestly supporting another candidate. It was fitting and generous for the Pioneer Press to grace its columns with such appreciative commendation in its next issue after his election, and how appropriate and deserved was its eulogium his six years of faithful and efficient service in the United States has fully illustrated.

No more capable representative of the general business interests of the state could have been elected than D. M. Sabin. With what possible higher qualification could a man be endowed for meeting the responsibilities of this high position? When the general business interest is competently served, nothing is neglected. It is when special or local business interests are made paramount to the general business interests, and when, as now, a candidate is put forward because he belongs to a certain locality, and will serve that locality and make its interests paramont to every other, that it becomes important to the people of the state outside that narrow boundary to see that their senator in the future, as heretofore, shall represent the general business interests. Indeed this question of subordinating the general welfare to local benefit is assuming such importance in this state that it invites serious attention. While the twin cities were competitors in their schemes before the legislature to secure some local advantage at the expense of the State, the members from outside had a guarantee of co-operation with the municipal rival. But having in some of their measures in the legislature, verified the truth of the aphorism "that in union there is strength," it seems quite apparent that in questions to be decided by the legislature, of which choosing a senator is of first importance, a new principle will dominate, and as throwing light upon it, the appellation of the "twin cities" becomes a most suggestive cognomen.

Mr. Sabin possessed the high qualifications for a senator ascribed to him by the Pioneer Press before he was inducted into and charged with the responsiblities of that high position, how largely must the experience of six years of service have added to his capacity for future usefulness. This is an aspect of this controversy that the representatives of the people who are to decide it cannot afford to overlook. Moreover, it should not be forgotten that the record of Mr. Sabin is before the people, and that in the earnest contest now going forward his opponents cannot point to an official act that impugns that record. He is charged with no blundering, with no incompetence, with no dereliction; but his opposers concede, as his friends claim, that he is eminently entitled to receive, and at the hands of an intelligent constituency he does receive, that highest of all encomiums," Well done, good and faithful servant."

In this issue political principles are not involved. The candidates are all supposed to be orthodox Republicans and characteristics that measure their relative fitness must be estimated on other grounds. Senator Sabin was inducted into the office six years ago with the qualifications so felicitously delineated by the Pioneer Press in the quotation given above, and his official career has made evident that this analysis was correct, that his accomplishments were not overstated, and to such ample ground-work is added six years of instructive experience. If no consideration, aside from the highest aptitude for discharging the duties of a representative of the entire state, with no partiality to any locality were considered, the name uttered by every Republican member of the legislature, when in the course of his official duty he is called upon to record his choice for United States senator, would be that of D. M. Sabin.

E. S. YOUMANS.

Verndale Journal: Senator Sabin has offered an amendment to the tariff bill reducing the duty on lumber 50 per cent.—from $2 to $1. It is thought that the amendment will pass both houses, it being in harmony with republican sentiment as hitherto expressed. Its only substantial opposition will be from the members from Maine who desire the highest tariff obtainable on lumber. The democrats will hardly oppose it strongly.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk.—ss.
In Probate Court. Special Term, December 24th, 1888.

In the matter of the estate of Margaret Barrette, deceased.

Whereas, An instrument in writing, purporting to be the last will and testament of Margaret Barrette, deceased, late of said county, has been delivered to this court.

And whereas, Joseph Barrette of said Polk County has filed therewith his petition, representing among other things, that said Margret Barrette died in said county on the fifth day of December 1888, testate, and that said petitioner is the sole executor named in said last will and testament, and praying that the said instrument may be admitted to probate, and that letters testamentary be to him issued thereon.

It is ordered, That the proofs of said instrument, and the said petition, be heard before this court, at the probate office in said county, on the 21st day of January A. D. 1889, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when all concerned may appear and contest the probate of said instrument.

And it is further ordered, That public notice of the time and place of said hearing be given to all persons interested by publication of these orders for three weeks successively previous to said day of hearing, in THE POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, a newspaper printed and published at Crookston in said county.

By the Court.

MORTGAGE SALE.

[First publication Jan. 3d, 1889.]

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two thousand three hundred ninety-three and 25-100 dollars, ($2,393.25-100) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Robert Houston and Evelyne M. Houston, his wife, to The Merchants' National Bank, of Crookston, bearing date the 23d day of March A. D. 1888, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 14th day of April A. D. 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m., in book "Z" of mortgages, on page 231, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, That by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Fifty (50) feet off the east side of lot twenty-three (23,) block two (2,) in Hurlbut's Addition to the townsite of Crookston, according to the plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, for Polk County, Minnesota, also lot five (5,) in section thirty-two (32,) township one hundred and fifty (150) north, range forty-six (46) west, containing thirty-four and 50-100 acres according to the government survey thereof, in Polk County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said county and state, on the 23d day of February A. D. 1889, at ten o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and fifty dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two hundred and eleven dollars and sixty cents, ($211.60,) principal and interest, due and which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Emeline Henlon, a widow, to Smith W. Fisk, bearing date the twelfth day of March A. D. 1887, and duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the eighteenth day of March A. D. 1887, at 11 o'clock and twenty-five minutes a. m., in book "S" of mortgages on pages 348 and 349, said mortgage was made to secure the payment of a promissory note of even date therewith, for the sum of two hundred dollars ($200.00,) payable on or before one year from the date thereof, made by said Emeline Henlon, payable to said Smith W. Fisk or order and delivered by said mortgager to said mortgagee at the date thereof, and whereas, the power of sale in said mortgage contained has become operative, and no action or proceedings at law or otherwise has been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz: Lots ten (10,) twelve (12) and fourteen (14,) in block three (3,) in Grand Forks East, according to the recorded plat thereof on file, and of record in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for said County of Polk and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, said premises being situate in said County of Polk, will be sold at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest and ten dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the costs and disbursements allowed by law, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said County of Polk, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said county and state, on the first day of February A. D. 1889, at 10 o'clock a. m., of that day, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Fergus Falls Journal.

Concerning the case of J. P. Farley of Dubuque against Hill, Kittson and the Manitoba R. R. Co., now on trial before Judge Brewer, United States court at St. Paul, the Telegraph, Aug. 16 last, published the following:

"In 1876 Mr. Farley was in charge of the St. Paul and Pacific (now the Manitoba,) being general manager of a division of 300 miles at a salary of $10,000 a year, and receiver of the remainder of the system, 400 mile. He saw the possibilities of railroad construction in the northwest and assured the company when its bonds were selling at five cents that, with ample money at his command, he could make the road pay. However, the bonds, $28,000,000, were held by Dutchmen residing in Holland, who had tired of their speculation and answered Mr. Farley that they would not invest another cent. A subordinate of Mr. Farley's, Mr. Fischer, communicated to J. J. Hill, now president of the Manitoba, and the late Commodore Kittson, Mr. Farley's positive conviction that there was a chance for a big speculation in the bonds. They had an interview with Mr Farley in which they stated that they didn't know where the bonds were nor how they could get at them, but if Mr. Farley would effect the deal they would give him an equal share in the profits, Kittson said he could get the $4,000,000 required to buy the $28,000,000 of bonds from his old associate in the Hudson Bay, Donald Smith, vice president of the Bank of Montreal, which had on hand $15,000,000 it didn't know what to do with, and was eager for a speculation promising some rich returns as this. Mr. Farley conducted the negotiations, and the deal was effected througe him. The compact was made in 1876, and the deal closed in January, 1877. The foreclosure proceedings were immediately begun, the $28,000,000 of bonds which had been secured being applied to the purchase of the road. Then there ensued legal complications with domestic stockholders, who were finally disposed of, $500,000 being paid them for their stock, making a total investment of $4,500,000 for a property in which Hill, Kittson, Farley, President Stephens and Vice President Smith, of the Bank of Montreal, by the terms of oral agreement between the three first named, were to have each a fifth interest. Then the company was reorganized, $15,000,000 of stock and $5,000,000 bonds being used. The enlargement of the system was at once undertaken and the company prospered until the stock became worth $1.66 and the bonds $1.08. Having learned that Hill and Kittson, who were to take care of his fifth of the whole profit, had made $15,000,000, Hill $9,000,000 and and Kittson $6,000,000, Mr. Farley called on them for his share, $5,000,000, but they refused to honor the agreement. He therefore entered suit at St. Paul against Hill, Kittson and the Manitoba company, the late J. M. Griffith, of Dubuque, appearing for him. The case came before Judge Treat, of the United States court, now deceased. He overruled the demurrer of the Manitoba company and Hill and Kittson thereupon obtained leave to withdraw their demurrer. For this they submitted a plea that Farley as receiver had acted for the Dutch bondholders in a fiduciary capacity, that his agreement with Hill and Kittson to buy the bonds, conceded it to have existed, was therefore a fraud on the Dutch, and that a court could not enforce a fraudulent contract in the interest of a party to it. The court accepted this view in an opinion severely reflecting on Mr. Farley, who took an appeal to the United States supreme court. Here he was represented by Senator Edmunds, the defence by Senator Evarts. The court last year reversed Judge Treat, holding that there had been no fraud by Farley or against the bondholders, and remanded the case for trial on its merits. Judge Brewer referred it to a referee to take testimony, and it is expected that the latter will make his report at the December term when the case will again be up for Judge Brewer's consideration. The issue is one of fact. All the testimony for the defense is in except that of John S. Kennedy, which is to be taken Sept. 3d at Berne, Switzerland, whither he has gone for his health, and Mr. Ferley and one of his attorneys, Beam & Cook of Chicago were there to cross-examine him. They will hurry back to prepare the case for the December term of court. The testimony of Mr. Kittson was not taken. He died on a train in Wisconsin a few months ago while en-route home for the purpose, as Mr. Farley believes, of endeavoring to effect a compromise. Hill swore positively before a referee that he had made no agreement with Mr. Farley but the latter had several witnesses to the contrary and besides 103 letters relating to the agreement and the negotiations, all of the latter having been made through him. Kennedy, the witness in Switzerland is known in Dubuque from his connection with the Cedar Falls & Minnesota railroad company.

The Mother at Home.

The Home: The mother is the heart of the home. She it is who determines its characteristics and diffuses through it that subtle atmosphere which every sensitive person can feel when introduced into the home circle, and from which can quickly be inferred the ruling spirit of the home. There can be no doubt that the most effective training for children is the training of example, and this truth the mother needs constantly to bear in mind. How can the impatient, querulous, and fault-finding mother teach patience and kindness and good temper? How can the vain mother teach humility? How can the mother deeply absorbed in keeping up with the pomps and vanities of life, eager for place and show, teach her children the true principles of a happy life? How can the selfish mother teach generosity or kindness, or the discontented mother teach contentment?

Hoard's Dairyman: One reason why there is so much truth in the oft-reiterated remark,—"Farming don't pay,"—is, that there is not another business on the face of the earth that, in proportion to the number engaged in it, supports so many incompetents. Mother Earth is kind, and gives a so-called farmer a living, even if he exercises but a little more brain than it takes to run the business of an Indian.

Marshall County Banner: Last Monday evening, John Bjorklend and John Ekstrom were together at Bjorklund's house in the town of Alma, in this county, partaking of some alcohol. An altercation arose between them and Bjorklund shot Ekstrom with a revolver in the chin, neck, and one arm. The wounded man will probably die from the effects of the wounds. Bjorklund left the neighborhood the next morning after the shooting; but we have learned that he was back to his house this morning. The officers are hunting for him; and it is to be hoped they will capture him; because he was one of the participants in a bloody fight at his house last April.

Imported Animals--Price and Quality.

Farm, Stock and Home: Importing an animal does not necessarily signify that it is a good one. Other countries have poor stock, as well as this. But it is true that a large majority of American importers pride themselves on the quality of the animals they import, and they buy only the best they can find. There are those, however, who who buy anything they can get, so that it is registered as "purely bred," and through such have come into the country a deal of scally-wag stuff, some of which is sold to the ignorant and careless at high prices, while others are offered as "the best," but at prices so low as to create the impression that legitimate dealers are but little short of extortioners. The truth is that in late years the margins of profit to importers have been growing narrower, and naturally so, for the competition which depresses prices here serves to advance them on the other side. This is particularly true of horses, and we are well convinced that reliable importers of these animals are not demanding greater profits than are justified by the capital invested the, risks of the business and the quality of their stock. If an imported animal of any kind is offered at a price greatly below that of well known and reliable dealers, we would regard the party making the offer with suspicion, and not conclude that dealers with reputations to sustain were trying to reap unreasonable profits.

Hoard's Dairyman: No man on earth can make money by half-starving stock; while we can make money by liberal feeding. It is skepticism on this point that keeps so many stock and dairy farmers poor, discouraged and disconsolate.

Country Homes--A Contrast.

New York Tribune: It has been my good fortune to visit a great many rural homes. In some it seems no wonder that children grow tired of the humdrum; for from morning till night the same routine prevailed day after day. They must do this or do that, and if a little tardy there was scolding, and when they did as directed there was never so much as a "thank you." Often I grieved for many a boy and girl just nearing manhood and womanhood knowing that their hearts and minds were starved. See them come into the sitting-room at evening-time, after the day's work on the farm, or in the kitchen, and see them sit down so weary, and spiritless, with nothing to interest them—no nice books or papers; no innocent games to quicken thought; no confidential talks with father or mother, perchance in relation to some farm product to be raised and sold; no bright rooms to make home attractive. It was work, work, without a thought beyond "saving money;" the parents' care seemed to be only for what the children could help them "make;" and no part of the proceeds, however small, was given to the children, to induce them to work, or to enable them to procure something which would gladden their lives.

Other homes were almost ideal. Bright rooms; books and papers; intelligent conversation; a general air of refinement; loving words between parents and children; perfect trust of members of the entire family. For each favor, however trivial, the kind "thank you" was given, and a request was accompanied with an "if you please. No harsh words, hardening the temper of the young; and the day's toil was pleasure because the labor was appreciated. The heads of such families are rewarded by their children's love for them and of home, and there will be no need, or desire, to go to the homes of others, or to the streets for amusement; they will prefer their own homes. Most children have a taste for the beautiful; give them something of beauty, for their own—a picture, a book, an animal to pet, or whatever they incline to, and then witness the pleasure it will bring to them. Encourage the children in all that tends to ennoble; and in old age you can look upon sons and daughters refined, intelligent and a blessing.

Deep Plowing.

Farm, Stock and Home.

A farmer philosophizes on deep plowing as follows:

"A deep soil is more valuable for all purposes than a thin soil—this is an admitted fact everywhere. Would not every one prefer to have a soil one foot deep rather than a soil six inches deep? One hundred acres of land with a soil one foot deep will sell for at least one-half more than the same amount of land with a soil six inches deep. It is a truth that has been well attested that earth brought to the surface from great depths in the earth will be, by the action of the elements, converted into productive soil. If, then, this is true—and no one can successfully dispute the fact—deep plowing will make the soil rich as far down as it is plowed. It only remains then to plow as deep as is practicable with the average farmer, in order to restore or create fertility. The ever changeable principles in nature have settled the utility of deep and thorough plowing. One of the main objects in plowing is to loosen up the soil that the roots of plants may be able to penetrate the soil in their growth, and for the same reason the soil should be broken up as far down as the general mass of roots go in their search after plant food and moisture."

Hoard's Dairyman: Probably the bulk of our dairy farmers would say, that to feed a cow 42 pounds per day of oat meal, corn meal, bran and oil meal, probably at an average cost of one cent per pound, together with the cost of the little forage she would need, or eat, would not pay. Of course it would not, to feed them to anything but the true dairy cow of great possible performance. But suppose she yields an average of 16 lbs. of butter for 47 weeks of the year, and raises a $25 calf, worth as much as her forage costs, and the fertilizer is worth as much as cost of care, then the account would stand about this way,—752 lbs. of butter at 30 cts. equals $225.60, and cost of grain at 42 cts. per day, $153 30, net profit, $72.30. We do not say that this is as profitable dairying as to feed 300 lb cows on ensilage, and very much less grain,—we hardly think it is as safe and reliable a business for most dairymen, but we figure it out to answer the carping that is made that these phenomenal cows, fed high, yield no profit to their owners. It is quite liberal too, when we assume that the calf of such a cow would only keep her in forage—when it would be worth more nearly $100.

Misses Alice Childs and Minnie Milne entered a course of study in the high school, Monday.

Charlie McKay returned to his work too soon, and was compelled to lay off again this week.

Christianson Bro's have moved into the building formerly occupied by Berthiaume Bro's.

Miss Annie Hanna closed her school Friday, and will attend the high school during the winter.

Mr. Galland surprised (agreeably) his friends in the city, by appearing on our streets again this week.

The snow fall causes a general smile of satisfaction to spread over the countenance of the woodman.

Mrs. J. L. Bailey was taken seriously sick Sunday night, but by prompt medical treatment, has recovered.

The Sargent boys had a big elephant on their hands, Monday, while moving Berthiaume Bros. safe to the depot.

Chris. Greenhalgh left Saturday morning for the coast, where he intends to visit among his many acquaintances.

Jim Kernan returned to St. Cloud Saturday night, with the intention of resuming his studies at St. Joseph's, Monday.

Little Gartha Sharpstine left on the train Saturday night for St. Paul, to be with her mother. A pretty long trip for a little girl of 9 years.

As we go to press, we understand that Dr. McGillan and his bride have returned to Warren, where a reception was given them by their friends.

Casper Sands has struck a bonanza in the line of artesian wells. At his farm, near Warren, may be seen a well yielding water at the rate of a barrel every 64 seconds.

W. S. Taylor and wife are east on a visit. They will spend some time at Mr. Taylor's old home in New York, and from there will go to Mrs. Taylor's home in New Hampshire.

J. L. Bailey, on visiting his farm near Kittson, a few days ago, found his self-binder in a demolished condition, some person or persons having broken the iron work beyond repairing.

The fur trade seems to be more prosperous than some other branches of industry at present. Large numbers of wolf and fox pelts have been brought into the city during the past few days.

Epton's delivery horse took a run Saturday afternoon, succeeding in breaking the wagon into so many pieces that it needed the undivided attention of an expert wagon maker, for several hours, to make it as good as new.

Andrew Lareviere and Mrs. Albina Allard were married in St. Mary's church on Saturday last. After the performance of the ceremony the bridal party, with a number of guests, proceeded to the residence of the bride's parents, in the 5th ward, where the wedding feast was partaken of.

Friday afternoon a team dashed out of Ole Bjoin's livery stable and turned down Ash street, throwing the driver from the carriage as they turned. Running a short distance the team freed itself from the carriage and were soon captured. No serious damage.

Ludwig, the alleged murderer of Olaf A. Wig, of St. Hilaire, was brought before Judge Spendley on Tuesday for examination. County Attorney Williams appeared for the prosecution, and Hon. H. Steenerson for the defence. After taking the evidence in the case, the Judge committed the defendant to jail to await the action of the grand jury.

On Friday evening, Jan. 4th, Doctor Tooly was surprised by a number of friends, who gathered at his residence on Main street, intent upon making his birthday anniversary one long to be remembered, and it is needless to say that they were successful. The Doctor will not soon forget the pleasures of the event, nor will any of the friends who participated in its pleasures.

How F. E. Hertz & Co., manage to sell choice grapes at this season for 35c per basket is a mystery, but that is what they are doing, if you don't believe it call 'round.

Our genial friend Lake, who has had charge of the Red River Elevator Co's flathouse, at Angus, has closed up for the season, and come to the city, where he expects to spend the balance of the winter.

F. E. Hertz & Co., need not fear to challenge any firm in the northwest, to exhibit a neater, better arranged, or more attractive store, than the one in which they are ready to receive their patrons. The store is a credit to the company, and the city.

Mr. Mitchell and Alonzo Ralston each took a load of school children 'round the city for a sleigh ride Tuesday afternoon, and, judging from the prolonged shouts of glee, we think the gentlemen were successful in their efforts to please the children.

The Scandia American Bank made a good showing through their quarterly report. They have added three directors, A. D. Stephens, E. P. Pierce and Max Ericsson to an already strong board and their prospects for the future are exceedingly encouraging.

R. E. Hussey lingered about the capital last week to witness the organization of the legislature. Dick says that, while he likes the climate and the country west, he thinks it is largely overdone and very liable to get an early and severe setback. He is of the opinion that there is as much money to be made in this country as that and is not advising any to go away out there.

The kind-hearted official, who granted the earnest request of his prisoner, to the effect that he would not confine him behind the bars, but allow him to stay at one of our city hotels, was rewarded for his kindness by losing his prisoner, who had the audacity to transfer the warrant from the officer's pocket to his own before leaving. The next morning the youthful officer was around trying to borrow a pair of "cuffs" from our local officers, with the purpose of pursuing and humiliating his unfaithful acquaintance, but though he pursued, he has not brought back his man. He has found that the heart of one man, at least, is deceitful beyond all else.

Miss Davis has engaged to teach the school in district 52 next season.

STEENERSON & McMANUS.

Last week we noticed the presence in our city, of Geo. Macdonald, from California. On Tuesday last he went over to Grand Forks where he was united for life to Miss Blanche Barker. The happy couple were in the city during the latter part of the week receiving congratulations and left for their new home Saturday night.

The Warren Sheaf and the Hallock Enterprise are in line for Sabin. They are leading papers in their respective counties and are earnestly seeking the best interests of the New Northwest. Having thoroughly looked into the matter they find that Mr. Sabin is now and always has been an indefatigable worker for the interests of this country. They can see clearly wherein he is identified with our interests.

It is now thought that commissioner John L. Gibbs is to be re-appointed upon the new board. This shows that the governor appreciates the wishes of the farmers of the State who, by a large majority desire Mr. Gibbs' re-appointment, satisfied that he has ever been true and faithful to their interests in every particular. The sentiment of the northwest is favorable to Gibbs as the farmer member, and Mc Grew for the legal.

We refer to farmers to whom we have made loans as to our promptness in dealing with them. Our old customers always recommend their neighbor to us.

STEENERSON & McMANUS.

Jim Westover reports the loss of about 400 bushels of oats from his granary on the southeast quarter of section 4, town of Fanny, recently. He went up there one day last week and found that his granary door had been broken open and a quantity of oats stolen. Jim says that the thieves, or one of them, left evidence in shape of something he evidently dropped by mistake which proves his presence in the granary unlawfully. If those oats are returned to Jim, or settlement made no further trouble will ensue, if not, look out for war.

Minnesota's Unsurveyed Lands.

Minneapolis Journal: Of the appropriation of $100,000 by congress for the survey of public lands Minnesota gets but $3,000, and this is all to be used in the survey of Kittson County, where six townships are to be surveyed in the spring or summer. This work will consume over two months. There yet remains 8,527,733 acres of unsurveyed acreage in the state, and there is a great deal of water in that. The greater portion of the unsurveyed lands are in Lake, St. Louis, Itaska, Kittson, Marshall, and Beltrami counties, and the work of surveying townships there is closely limited by the insufficiency of the appropriation. Preference is to be given to localities where the townships are occupied in whole or in part by actual settlers, and the surveyor-general is expected to ascertain where there are bona fide settlers and use the appropriations for the benefit of their townships.

Christ Church Items.

There will be service as usual next Sunday evening, the union service having fallen through. Hereafter there will be service every Sunday evening, from October to May at 7:30 o'clock p. m., and from May to October at 8 o'clock.

There will be a book social at the residence of Mrs. Hack, this evening, (Thursday,) beginning at 8 o'clock. The object is to provide a library for the Sunday school, gifts either in suitable books or money will be thankfully received. A very cordial invitation is extended to all the members and friends of Christ church.

The Rev. J. C. Fortin will hold divine service at Fisher next Sunday, at 3:30 o'clock p. m.

A chapter of the King's Daughters, in connection with the church was organized last Thursday at the residence of Mrs. Moore. Mrs. Moore was elected president and Mrs. Sieberts vice president and Mrs. Ford, secretary and treasurer. It is expected that much good will result from this organization.

By all accounts that we have of the situation in St. Paul, Hon. D. M. Sabin is safely in the lead and will no doubt succeed himself as U. S. Senator. Bets that he will be nominated on the second ballot are freely offered, but as yet no takers can be found.

Detroit Record: The St. Paul Globe has scooped all its competitors by announcing the next board of railroad commissioners as Gibbs, Becker and Barto.

How is this for another "scoop?" J. P. Williams, of Fergus Falls, Gibbs and Becker.

Having interviewed many of our citizens, THE JOURNAL finds that a large majority are favorable to D. M. Sabin for U. S. Senator. His course in the Senate has shown him to be clearly identified with the interests of the Northwest in every particular. He is not the president of a railroad company and his sympathy is with the people every time on all questions affecting the rights and interests of the people. His action on the Nelson bill for opening the Red Lake Indian Reservation shows his deep interest in the poor settlers of the Northwest and entitles him to the hearty support of every dweller in this country. He is closely identified with the effort to get new railroads into this country, and we have not any too many of that kind of men to look after our interests. One of the needs of this country, which we feel at the present time, is an independent line of road. Mr. Sabin is fully in sympathy with us in this matter, and should he be elected, will be in a position to do us great good in this particular. If Mr. Washburn should even wish to be with us on this question, the very nature of the case, his connection with the Soo road, would prevent him. The Soo road was built on purpose to prevent our wheat reaching Duluth, or the eastern sea-board, by a direct water route. It is for our interest to get our wheat to Duluth—the head of navigation—by as direct a route as possible. It is for the interest of the Soo road to prevent this. Mr. Washburn is the head of the Soo road and must work for its interests.

The daily papers publish a dispatch from Private Dalzelle under date of Caldwell, O., Dec. 25th, stating that as a New Year's gift to comrade pensioners he informs them of $14,000,000 awaiting them in the United States treasury. He says that not less than 400,000 present pensioners are entitled to from $25 to $35 each, or about the aggregate amount named, which they can have by simply applying for it in Washington as follows:

First—5 cents per mile from place of discharge home; second—25 cents daily for extra duty between April and October, 1862; third—58 cents daily while in prison or on furlough.

He says he obtained his extra compensation as pensioner in these particulars by simply applying for it last year, and that not one in ten Americans know of the legality of such procedure.

Law Supplement Swindle.

Northfield News.

The St. Cloud Daily Times has the following interesting facts about the publication of the law supplements: The above is a harsh term, but if the following comparison of figures do not bear it out, we will "take it all back." Heretofore, there has been competition in St. Paul in the publication of law supplements. Two years ago, H. P. Hall sent out a circular quoting prices per folio at which the laws would be furnished country newspapers. The Northwestern Newspaper Union, a part of the Pioneer Press establishment, followed, offering supplements at one-quarter cent less than Hall. The object was to "clean H. P. out" and leave a clear field for monopoly—a trust. It did not succeed. The newspaper boys stood by H. P. Hall, as he had always stood by them. This year he is not in the business and what is the result? Here are the figures. The first column gives Hall's figures of 1887, the Northwestern Union's were one-quarter of a cent lower per folio. The second column shows the price which the latter concern is exacting this year.

What do our newspaper brethren think of the "swindle," we can call it nothing less. Here it is:

Two years ago our supplements cost us $17.60, or 1¾ cents per copy. This year they would cost $44. The Pioneer Press' Northwestern Newspaper Union charges this amount for 1,000 supplements or 4 4-10 cents per copy. If that is not a swindle what is?

Something should be done. The intelligent newspaper men of the state should not allow themselves to be hoodwinked in this way. Better abolish the law altogether than to turn one-third of the appropriation into the Pioneer Press treasury.

The Senatorial Matter.

Brainerd Dispatch.

There is no use in disguising the fact that there has been a great change in sentiment in regard to the senatorial contest in this city, as well as in various other parts of the state, since the fight began. While at the outset the Dispatch spoke favorably of the candidacy of W. D. Washburn, it was with the understanding that the republicans of this city and section of the country desired to see that gentleman elected to the exalted position of United States senator, and at that time there seemed to be a tide of sentiment in his favor in this region that would carry everything before it. At that time a representative of this paper made a hurried canvass among the leading republicans of Brainerd, and it was ascertained that the ratio of Washburn supporters to any other candidate was three to one in his favor. Since that time, however, there have been great changes, and these men now express themselves as favorable and anxious to see D. M. Sabin succeed himself. The election of C. H. Graves, of Duluth, as speaker of the house, was a decided victory for the Sabin men, more so because the Washburn men forced the issue and endeavored to place Mr. Morgan in the speaker's chair, and the Pioneer Press, Minneapolis Tribune and other ardent Washburn papers claimed that in the election of Morgan their victory on the senatorial matter would be certain or materially aided. On the following day, however, these same papers alluded to the defeat of Morgan in an entirely different attitude, and claimed that the issue was not identical and that it cut no figure in the senatorial contest. The other element made the most of it and Sabin stock went up several notches. The fact seems to pervade the air in St. Paul that whatever happens W. D. Washburn will not be the next senator from Minnesota.

Interesting to Writers.

"Writing for Young People—Ideal," "Short hand for Literary Purposes," "Mental Dyspepsia," "Statute Regulations for the Press," "On Quoting," and "Learning to Write" and among the many literary topics discussed by well-known writers in the January number of The Writer (Boston.) This unique magazine for literary workers is now in its third volume, and its continued success and prosperity are assured. To young writers it is simply invaluable, while writers of experience find it both instructive and entertaining. The first two volumes of the magazine contain such a fund of practical and helpful information about the details of literary work as had never been put into print before. While each succeeding number seems to be as bright, and fresh, and entertaining as its predecessors. The price of The Writer is ten cents a number or one dollar a year. Address: The Writer, P. O. Bread Materials:

There was a dearth of wheat in England in 1629, 1630 and 1693, and in those years bread was made of turnips. They were boiled unti they were soft enough to mash, when the greater part of the water was pressed out of them. An equal weight of wheat meal was then mixed with the pulp, and the dough rose well in the trough, and after being kneaded was formed into loaves and put in the oven. Bread prepared in this manner has a peculiar sweetish taste which is said to be not disagreeable. It is as light and white as wheaten bread, and should be kept about twelve hours before being cut, when the smell and taste of the turnip will scarcely be perceptible.

Potato bread is another kind, and there are several processes of making it. The simplest is to choose the large, mealy sort, boil them as for eating, and then peel and mash them very fine, without adding water. Two parts of wheat flour are added to one of potatoes, and a little more yeast than usual. The whole mass is kneaded into dough, and allowed to stand a proper time to rise and ferment before it is put into the oven. Bread so prepared is said to be good and wholesome. Erasmus Darwin advised the grating of raw potatoes into cold water, where the starch would subside. The starch from eight pounds of potatoes, mixed with eight pounds of boiled potatoes, he asserted, would make as good bread as the best wheaten flour.

Dr. Darwin even went so far as to say that hay that has been kept in stacks so as to undergo the saccharine process may be so managed by grinding and fermentation with yeast, like bread, as to serve in part for the sustenance of mankind in times of scarcity.

To make rice bread, boil three parts of wheat flour and one part of rice, separately. Boil the rice well, squeeze out the water and mix the mass with the wheat. The process is then the same as for common wheat bread. A pound and a half of flour mixed with half a pound of rice will produce a loaf weighing from three pounds to three pounds two ounces, which is a greater gain than is got from wheat flour alone. Rice has also been tried in the same proportion with barley, and this makes a good bread for laboring people. Bread may also be made from buckwheat and the seeds and roots of several scores of plants. —Good Housekeeping.

How It Feels To Be Scalped.

From the New York Sun.

The man who can tell more tales of Indian fighting, bear hunting, and wild life generally than any other man west of the Rockies is Carroll Bronson, a pioneer of the Selkirk mountains in British Columbia. It is forty-two years since he made his way alone from the head waters of the Missouri to those mountains, and he is now in San Francisco, seeing for the first time in all these years a town of more than a thousand persons.

His face is scarred from arrowwounds received in Indian fights, and if he lifts his long white hair from the side of his head he shows a great circular scar extending from above his right eye clear around the right side and back of his head almost to the left ear. That is where the old man was scalped.

"It was in '66, with the Sioux," he explained, "and it was the worst brush I ever had with the Indians. They came upon a camp of nine of us and one of them pounced upon me, seized me by the hair, and cut right around my head where you see this scar. Then he gave a sharp wrench upward with his right arm and laid the whole skull bare. I cannot describe the pain it gave me, and I don't believe I could have endured any more without simply dying of it. There is no other torture man can be subjected to that will begin to compare with being scalped.

"It is a common belief that a man can't live after being scalped, but I've survived the experience a matter of twenty-two years, and I don't think I'm quite to the end of my journey yet, even if I am 70 years old. I knew another man up there, too, who didn't die under the scalping knife. The scalp was torn completely off from the whole top of his head, so that it had to be constantly swathed in cotton and olive oil. He lived a year. That man knew what suffering means, if ever a man did."

Novel Harbor Defence.

It is stated that a large company backed by the usual millions of dollars, has proposed to the United States Secretary of the Navy "a striking and possibly effective scheme for the defense of Philadelphia Harbor, and the harbors of other cities, from the attack of an enemy's fleet, by shooting ignited petroleum at the unfriendly ships from the bottom of the river and burning them up."

The originators of the petroleum defence scheme have induced the Government to give directions for a preliminary examination of Philidelphia Harbor, and a company has been organized to develop the plan and to show its practicability.

It is proposed to sink perforated iron pipes in the river bed and the approaches to the harbor, through which petroleum can be forced to the surface of the river by machinery and a high pressure. In this way a fierce stream of blazing oil can be sent down on the enemy's fleet, to destroy it or drive it away.

It is claimed by the projectors that a flame can be produced in this way as high as a ship's masts, and sent with terrific force on the attacking vessels many miles from the point where the oil is supplied to the system of submerged pipes, and even iron vessels could not pass through this lake of fire, because it could be made to extend many miles along the river.

An experiment in connection with the scheme is to be made at Fort Muffin shortly, and great things are expected from the pending experiment.

Through Gates of Gold.

CHAPTER I.

The Lady Betty was swearing. She was not drunk, however. Under the present conditions reigning at the fort, it would have been difficult to have attained to any such indulgence of body and mind. For there was little left to drink; still less to eat; while desperate anxiety darkened every face, and the shadow of death loomed close at hand. Yet black as matters looked, with hundreds of Indians furiated with bloodthirst closing them in on all sides, with only a dozen men to hold the fort, and protect the two women shut up there with them, with amunition running short, with food and water distributed on principles of the strictest economy, with a blazing sun overhead to add to the torture of the long hours, with their ceaseless dread and expectation, with no prospect but death at the hands of a cruel merciless foe; yet the Lady Betty was not swearing at the present conditions of her existence, but at the one other woman shut up with her in the besieged fort.

It would have been difficult to say, looking at her now as she stood within the stockade, drawn back into the doorway of the buildings to avoid meeting the other woman who had just passed by, why she had ever gained the title of "The Lady Betty." The usual tawdry finery with which she was delighted to adorn herself was faded, torn, and dirty, there being no opportunity in that doomed, out-of-the-world fort, peopled only by that handful of desperate men, for repairing her deficiencies of toilet. There was no dignity in the reckless abandonment of herself to the low, vulgar passions that convulsed her. The coarse beauty of her face was disregarded by hate, rage, and desire of revenge.

But some one in her past had given her the nickname, and it had stuck to her ever since. She had been little more than a child then; she was just a woman now, a year or two still off thirty, but the years through which that name had clung to her might have reckoned as a century if their experience of reckless life were measured instead of time. The Lady Betty had enjoyed herself after her own fashion.

But this afternoon, in a vague, dumb way, as some maddened, paintortured brute might resent the agony of the lash brought on itself by its own ungoverned passion, she felt that those years of reckless folly had brought their own punishment.

Until a fortnight ago—when this girl with her father had been rescued and brought into the fort under a hailstorm of bullets, which had cost the lives of three of the garrison who had made a sortie to save the strangers—The Lady Betty and "the boys" had been the best of friends. She had shouldered her rifle side by side with them. She had taken her share in the watches; she had eaten, lived, laughed with them, fearless as they of the death that threatened them. Now all this was changed. Though The Lady Betty, even thinking over it calmly, which she never did—the very thought of these two strangers, whose advent in the fort had been baptized by the loss of three of the bravest and brightest of the boys, filling her rage—could hardly have defined the change or how it first began.

The boys were never unkind to her. She knew that they went on short rations so that she as well as that girl stranger should have more. But this knowledge only made her more furious. Had not she been a good comrade with them? She did not want them to shorten their allowance for her, as they did for that delicate, pale-faced girl, who scarcely knew one end of a gun from the other—at least she did not when she came. Now she could handle and load one; Sorry Carew had taught her. The Lady Betty set her teeth as she remembered watching the lessons the girl had begged for. All the boys had wanted to teach her. But it was Sorry Carew who had given the lesson. As The Lady Betty remembered the look on his handsome face as he stood by her, showing her how to handle his rifle, she drew in her breath with a sharp, short sob, as if that first shot fired by the girl had gone through her own heart.

But though the boys were as good to her in their rough, familiar way as they had always been, something seemed to have come between them and her. They were no longer so recklessly cheerful in her society. When she swore they seemed always afraid that that girl would hear her. They evidently preferred now to keep their lives to themselves, and desired her to do the same.

The old happy-go-lucky familiarity in which, if there were no respect, there was no troublesome question of etiquette, had vanished. This invisible though perfectly tangible barrier against which she fretted and raged was impassable. Once when she had broken out and stormed at and reproached and cursed one of the men, asking why they all kept so aloof from her, he had looked perplexed for a moment or two, and then answered her:

"Wa'al, I guess we don't forgit as how you're game," he said, awkwardly and doubtfully; "but you see you're a woman, and so's she."

Ah! that "she." How she hated her! It all started from her. The boys only thought of her now. They would have laid themselves down for her to walk over. To get a word or smile from her they would have gone to their death. It was for her they had giving up cursing, gambling, and The Lady Betty. Poor Lady Betty! —it was hard. She who had shared their perils as well as their pleasures, to be put aside for this pale, quiet-faced girl, who had been a total stranger to their lives a fortnight before. They were ashamed of her, too. They did not care to see her near that proud-eyed girl. They were uneasy if she joined them in her presence. The girl's father would openly show his dislike. He would take the girl away when she drew near them; he would look as if he feared pollution for his beloved, spotless daughter from the very touch of The Lady Betty's garment. At first The Lady Betty had defied him, as she had defied the boys, and forced herself upon them, and taken a pleasure in startling that delicate piece of goods with her reckless oath-garnished talk. She took a malevolent pleasure in arousing that frightened, shrinking, wondering disgust on the lovely face that had so bewitched the boys.

They did not speak till they reached that part of the low wood buildings in which rooms had been given her and her father. It was Miriam who broke the awkward silence.

"Why does she hate me so?" she asked, looking up at him with eyes still bright with her hurt. "It seems hard, when she and I are the only woman here—and when to-morrow we may be dead."

Her voice caught and fell into lower tones.

They had not told her what manner of woman The Lady Betty was. She thought her coarse, vulgar, insolent, foul-mouthed, but she believed her honest. Her father and the other men had kept up the delusion, sprung like an angel's fancy from her own pure soul.

"You must not mind her," said Carew, awkwardly, remembering her faith. She's brave and she's true. She has faced death with us, and" —he stopped short. As he looked into the girl's sweet, half-indignant, half-pained eyes he felt it sacrilege to even speak of The Lady Betty's good qualities. Poor Betty's good qualities. Poor Lady Betty!

"I don't mind her!" a little pettishly. She had discovered some beauty in The lady Betty, and she remembered that fact now as she listened to Sorry Carew's praises and saw how his handsome face flushed as he stanered and broke down.

"I dare say he thinks her lovely, dressed up in that tawdry, dirty finery!" she thought. And then she remembered how near death was, and her heart grew tender and true again under the chastening thought.

"Oh, how wicked I am Mr. Carew!" she exclaimed, her eyes filling with pitying, remorseful tears. "Tell her not to hate me so! Tell her we ought rather to love each other!" And she ran into the house, shutting the door between her and the young man. He stood there aghast, dismayed, bewildered at her tears, at her passionate self-accusation to which he had no clue, his mind refusing any possibility of there being the simplest flaw in her goodness and sweetness. And her message to The Lady Betty filled him with consternation and despair for himself, passionate wonder and admiration for the sender, and shame and angry remorse for The Lady Betty.

CHAPTER II.

But each hour brought the doom of that little fort, so splendidly held for so long, nearer. Daring, coolness, endurance, the simple self-sacrifice and unselfishness of these dozen men, who had become so many heroes, were to be all of no avail.

The same night another council of war was held. The Indians would not stay inactive much longer; the only wonder was that they had kept quiet so long. If they had continued the active attack first made the ammunition of the fort would long ago have been expended. But their inaction gave no ease. It would only be a prelude to worse devilries. Some of the men there, worn out with ceaseless watching, the intolerable heat, the insufficient food, and the terrible anxiety, would have preferred the rush and shock of a desperate charge, and then have had it all over, meeting death as an honorable friend. But there were the women to be thought of. Already gloomy shadows darkened the men's eyes as they looked at the beautiful girl. By what dreadful means must she be delivered from the hands of those devils? But the girl had already decided for herself.

"You will know what to do for me, father, when the time comes," she said to him quietly one night, as she bade him "Good-night" in the starlight. He caught her close to him, and kissed her without a word; but she knew that he understood. The men sat late discussing the situation.

If only Colonel Shaw, who must have reached by this time Fort James, could hear of their position he would hasten to their assistance. Provisions would hold out—dividing them into the smallest portion sufficient to keep them alive—for another four days; ammunition, if the Indians proved troublesome, half that time. But who was to go and hasten Shaw's advance?

It was certain death to leave the fort. Not that any of the boys troubled about that, as he, personally, was concerned. But the loss of each life made the chance of the rest less. And "the rest" always now meant the women, in the men's thoughts. Besides the discovery of an attempt to leave the fort for aid would, to a certainty, precipitate the plans of the Indians. Shaw would surely soon hear of the enemies force concentrated at Fort Buff, and advance rapidly to their rescue. There was nothing to do but wait for him. Not that even this hope of his arrival brightened their prospects. Each man knew—though he did not say it—that it was far more than probable that the instant the Indian scouts discovered the approach of the soldiers, their doom would be sealed. The Indians would fire the fort and massacre its defenders long before Shaw could reach them. Nothing but the most subtle tactics on Shaw's side, to disguise his movements, could prevent the catastrophe. If only a messenger could reach him to acquaint him with all the difficulties of the situation!

The men separated, some to sleep; some to keep up the ceaseless, harassing watch; without having been able to decide upon anything better than to wait.

The next day dawned. There were signs of activity once more among the Indians. They rode out singly, or in bodies, from their place of shelter, pointing and gesticulating in enraged derision, toward the fort, breaking out into wild war whoops, which curdled the blood in the girl's veins. Shots were fired, too, which the men in the fort, though burning to avenge each one with a dozen, dared not return, for not a bullet could be wasted. They would need them all for the last struggle. The women—or rather Miriam, for The Lady Betty had scouted, in savage mockery, the idea—had been kept inside the building, to be out of the way of the shots. The long, weary day passed, the afternoon waned. Miriam, rebelling against her captivity, ventured to disobey orders. As she stepped outside she caught sight of The Lady Betty disappearing into a small shanty, built on rising ground at the other end of the stockade. She looked about her; none of the boys were near. A sudden impulse—for which the girl could never account, unless it were a simple womanly desire for the sympathy of her own sex at this supreme moment of peril —made her run across the space between the building she occupied and the shanty. She reached the door, which The Lady Betty had left ajar. The girl called her softly. There was no answer, and, pushing the door open, Miriam looked in. There was a square opening for a window at the end of the room, and through this opening poured the golden light of the western sun. It rolled in waves of dazzling radiance into the room, and in the midst of it bathing her as in a sea of fiery light, stood, rigid still, gazing through the opening, The Lady Betty. She seemed to be seeing a vision, so pale was her face, so staring and fixed her eyes.

The girl spoke again gently, but the woman did not stir, and Miriam, stepping half fearfully, for she did not know how she would be received, went up to her. But as she reached the woman's side, and instictively followed the gaze of her rapt eyes, an exclamation of awed delight and wonder broke from her lips.

Through a break of the wood-lined hills, facing the window, the sun was setting in a perfect glory of red and gold. The whole horizon, narrowed to them by those hills, seemed a sea of fire, which stretched on in liquid, quivering waves of light from heaven to them, as they stood on the earth. And as the girl looked she forgot the hideous cries, and the whizzing shot, and the horrors that, to them, must wait on death; and a great peace fell on her.

"It is like the golden gate of heaven!" she cried under her breath. "And we shall pass through them, and then the sorrow and the sighing will seem short, for they will be no more!"

She was not conscious of speaking aloud. The Lady Betty started; a shudder—was it of hate and rage, or of a spiritual dread of the mystery of death?—shook her from head to foot.

She turned sharply, staring stupidly for a second at Miriam, her eyes blinded with the radiance into which she had been gazing. Then, as she understood who had spoken, her eyes blazed, and she flung out her hands as if to dash the girl aside.

"Git!" she cried, in a horse, chocked voice, "you shan't take this from me, too!"

But Mariam caught her hands.

"Oh, don't let us quarrel!" she cried with a half sob. "Be my friend! How can we go through the golden gate with hate between us!"

The woman broke into a reckless, jeering laugh, whose bitterness appalled the girl.

"I've heard on them golden gates? I recken ez now, they ain't fur sich ez me. Only for fine folks ez you!"

"Oh!" cried the girl. What makes you so hard? If I have done you any wrong without knowing, forgive me; and take my hand."

But The Lady Betty struck it from her with such savage force that the delicate fingers were bruised, and a faint cry of pain was forced from the girl. An imprecation broke on the air, and Sorry Carew, who had reached the doorway just in time to see the blow, sprang forward, and caught the poor little wounded hand in his.

"Come away!" he cried, hoarsely, to the trembling girl. "It is not fit that you should be here. Stand back!" He made a fierce gesture to The Lady Betty.

She fell back, mastered by the look in his eyes and the merciless gesture. But she could not get out of the light that was now filling the cabin.

But the meaning of the woman's dreadful recklessness, of the man's gesture, broke in some strange way—for she had had, in her protected school-girl existence, no knowledge of the evil of life—on the girl's understanding. She drew her hand from the young man's grasp, and ran over to where the unhappy woman stood scowling and cowering in the corner of the light-filled room.

"See!" she cried. her sweet voice unsteady and strained with the passion of infinite pity, that swept as a wave over her heart, and which made it seem as if that knowledge must have come direct from heaven itself. "You cannot get out of the light! It is because the golden gates are open so wide—so wide that there is room for you to enter as well as me."

And then she fled from the room, and the young man did not dare protect her any more.

He went out into the air with a look on his face which had never been there before.

And there was no sound left in the room, save the wild, choking sobs of the woman, who had flung herself down in the dust, with the red light streaming full upon her.

CHAPTER III.

It was midnight. There was no moon; but the night was luminous with the starlight, and The Lady Betty, creeping like a gliding shadow from the shanty to the building where Miriam slept, muttered an oath, which she choked immediately, than glanced round with a fierce, half-shamefaced expression, as if defying any one who might have overheard the suppression, to prove that she was growing more virtuous.

But even this faint light angered her, for she did not want any one to see her. Since his arrival at the fort, Mr. Gresham had taken his share in all the duties of their situation, and at this moment he was sharing the watch with some of the others. The Lady Betty knew this, and pushed open the outer door of the building, knowing that there was no chance of meeting him. Miriam slept in an inner room, and to this, with her swift, steady feet, The Lady Betty crept. The girl lay fast asleep in the starlight, shining through a window over her head. The woman with her eager, bloodshot eyes stood gazing down upon her with a look in which fierce despair, jealousy and rage struggled with gratitude and awe. How peaceful and beautiful she looked! The angels that went in and out of those golden gates must be like her. She sank down on her knees by the bedside with a sharp cry. Miriam sprang up, her heart beating till she was nearly suffocated from the suddenness of the awakening, her eyes full of anguished fear. Were the Indians here at last! Then her eyes fell on the woman, and a different fear seized her. From the exaltation of that infinite pity a reaction had set in. She was not an angel—only a woman. Young intolerant, as all youth, strong in its own purity, always is. That afternoon she had been inspired, raised to her highest level—perhaps above it—for she had still much to learn by endurance and suffering. Since that supreme moment she had had time to think, and her horror, her bitter scorn of the sin, had overwhelmed her pity for the sinner.

"What do you want?" she asked, her voice cold, unsteady with her fear and dislike.

"I reckon ez how I jess kem to ask you a question," said The Lady Betty in a hard voice, but it was no longer bitter or reckless, though she felt to the quick the change in the girl, who sat up, with the starlight shining on her white, proud face. "It mayn't be ez what you'd like to answer. But I ain't foolin'. The red skins is sorter too close for thet. Do you love Sorry Carew?"

Miriam stared at her speechless, a rush of scarlet blood staining her face, throat, and even ears. She was revolted, shamed, enraged, half stunned with the shock of the question. Every nerve in her quivered with it. It was as if a rude, brutal hand had suddenly rent aside the veil that sheltered the modesty and delicacy of her maiden heart.

Love! What was it to her still, but a vague, beautiful fancy, scarcely breathed yet to herself. And now that this woman—this woman should dare—! The Lady Betty stumbled to her feet. She took the girl's silence of intolerable humiliation for an answer in the affirmative. Such a phase of feeling torturing the girl was incomprehensible to her—wasted and degraded as all her own finest instincts of womanhood were. For one second a sense of her own sacrifice—a bitter, wild rebellion against its need—a dreary consciousness of her miserable, empty life fell on her and it seemed impossible.

And then suddenly upon her poor storm-racked soul there seemed to shine that golden light of the afternoon, and she remembered how this girl had come to her in it, and touched her with her pure hands; and begged her, The Lady Betty, to enter those golden gates, side by side, with her!

"I reckon ez now I'll try and get through them golden gates," she said in a faint broken voice, with a strange little flickering across her lips.

She was gone before the girl could speak, or had even understood.

The Lady Betty glided back to her own quarters, where she hastily made a few preparations. Fort James, which Shaw was supposed to have reached by this time, was full 70 miles away. She had made up her mind to be the messenger to him. She had assisted at that conference the night before, and knew how desperate matters were. She knew, too, every peril that would beset her.

And now to leave the fort. The boys must not know till she was gone. A great desire to take one last look at Sorry Carew, who had just turned in and lay sleeping only twenty yards from her in one of the outhouses, shook her cool courage. But she conquered. Where was the good? She had given him up forever. She was out of the fort at last.

At the third dawn from that night, about a mile still from Fort James, a woman staggered and fell at the feet of some of Shaw's men. It was difficult to recognize her womanhood —such a disfigured, disheveled, tattered thing she was. Her face was crusted with dust and blood, for she had been severely wound; her lips were black and parched, her feet bleeding and torn. They thought as they raised her that she was dead. under the blazing sun, through the blackness of night, hunted down by her bloodthirsty foes, lying hidden from them for hours in the water, in holes in the ground, creeping out again to stagger on, starving, fainting from loss of blood, pain, and those awful miles upon miles of march, she had yet brought her message to Shaw.

It was marvelous how she had done it. Nothing but that resolve, which grew as the hours went on, into almost a madness of desire to save Miriam and Carew, carried her through it all. At first she could force no sound from lips and throat; but at last they understood. Even now she asked to go with the relieving party, dreading their ignorance of Indian warfare. Which might hurry on the catastrophe. But she relapsed into unconciousness as she spoke and was delirous when she awoke again. She was tenderly nursed. She was the heroine of the hour—a fact which, when she recovered a little, she resented with the whole force of her vocabulary.

But the news they gave her one afternoon made her turn her face to the wall and lie silent and still for a long time. Her friends were saved. She insisted upon getting up and going about the next day. Nor would she wait till the relieved garrison reached Fort James.

The evening before they were to arrive she left. The sun was setting across the level prairie as she rode out of the fort and all the west was radiant with its glory. She turned her horse's head toward it and sat for a moment, with a wistful, rapt gaze in her eyes, looking straight into the radiance, flooding earth and sky, before her.

Then she turned to the people who had come to see her start.

"Tell Miriam Gresham and Sorry Carew ez how I'm goin' toward them golden gates—she'll know—and I reckon ez how I'll never keer fur to come back."

And she rode away into the golden light. Nor did those who had once known her ever see her come out of it again.—All the Year Round.

Mastodons in Alaska.

That the mastodon was once common in Alaska is certain from the great number of skeletons found in the marshes and clay banks of the Yukon and northern plains; but that this huge pachyderm still exists there in the living state has never been deemed likely, or even conjectured, till recently.

This conjecture rests on reports by way of the Stick Indians on the White River, a tributary of the Yukon.

The account is that while hunting on a wooded bottom, a few miles from the river, two Indians came upon a trail, consisting of enormous tracts, fully two feet across, deeply imprinted in the moss and earth, strewn along near which were broken branches of the trees.

Following cautiously on these signs, they at length heard the noise of the creature feeding, and presently espied a prodigious animal, as large, they assert, as a white man's house —meaning the trader's one-story store.

Its teeth, they declared, were as long as a man's leg, and curved outward, while its ears were likened to a sealskin in size. In color it was represented to be dark brown. It leaned against a dead tree-stub, and scratched its side, and its body seemed to be covered with patches of coarse brown hair. Terrified at the sight of such enormous game, the two hunters promptly retreated.

Other native hunters corroborate this story with similar accounts of their experiences; accounts which they are reluctant to relate for fear of ridicule, or from some superstitious feelings regarding the matter.

The uncharitable attribute the apparition of the strange beast to the vision-disturbing effects of the hoochinoo—a particularly villainous kind of whiskey distilled from molasses. Others rejoin that Indians never take hoochinoo while on a hunt—or, in other words, that they never go on a hunt as long as there is any hoochinoo left in the rancherie.

This may be subjecting the narrative of the natives to a somewhat harsh criticism, the more so when it is considered that one of the two who saw the supposed mastodon is an Indian of known probity and good character—he with three others of his tribe having brought down to the trading post the body of the late murdered bishop.—Youth's Companion.

The Climate of Panama.

The country through which most of the canal must run is a forest of jungle so thick with underbush that the native cannot penetrate it without first cutting out his path with ax and machete. The climate of the isthmus is very unhealthy, and the deadly Chagres fever hills one attacked in thirty-six hours. Those towns which have been built expressly for the large numbers of laborers are composed of small frame houses, but their location is too close to the immense excavations to be healthy. There is no sight more oppressive than the dead stillness during a heavy rain on the line. The reddish yellow, soapy soil is so slippery that one can scarcely stand on an incline, and on this surface the water runs to the bottom, where the excess is carried off to lower levels, but the most of it forms in stagnant pools at the bottom.

The high paid superintendents have very comfortable dwellings, and they enjoy a very easy life, but the condition of the wretched laborer is terrible. From living in the hot fever vapors, exposed to wet and dry weather, and breathing an air vitiated by contact with a newly turned soil, their complexions have become a yellow and transparent parchment, as seen in the last stages of consumption; but the necessarily high wages induce them to continue, well knowing they are giving up life for gold, until the commonest isthmus sight is seen, i. e., the laborer laid out on his bier in front of his wretched shanty, with two candles at his feet.—Panama Cor. New York Times.

Three Little Travelers.

Two 9-year-old girls and a 7-year-old boy, with leather belts around their waists, and a note tied to each belt, were passengers on the Southern express on the Pennsylvania railroad They had traveled all the way from Germany alone. The notes tied to their belts were as follows:

To All Conductors.—These children, three of them, are bound for Galveston, Texas, where they will find their father. They are on the way from Germany. Their tickets are in their pockets.

None of the children could speak English. Through an interpreter, one of the girls told a Sun reporter that her name was Annie, her sister was Gertrude and her brother was John. Their father was Joseph Kolsky. He left Germany three years ago. Their mother died two months ago, and their father sent money to them to come to this country. The railroad officials telegraphed orders ahead to look out for the children.—New York Sun.

The Figure Nine in Our Years.

New York Sun.

For the space of 111 years we are to have the figure 9 in our years, and the occulists, who put much stress upon figures, predict that the condition of mankind will be greatly improved over all past times during this period. It is the age of Kal Yuga.

Felons.

The medical name of this affection is whitlows. Every one who has been attacked by a felon will admit that it richly deserves its name. The Saxon name whitlow—a white flame —refers to the intense burning pain which attends it, and the whitened skin over the matured abscess.

There are four forms, though if neglected, the first may run into the second, and the second into the third. The first is superficial, and originates at the side of the nail in the true skin under the scarf-skin, or cuticle. The pain is not at first severe; but if the cuticle is not opened and cut away with scissors, the skin may ulcerate, and the pus work its way beneath the nail.

In the second form, the flesh of the first joint (phalanx) is inflamed, in consequence of some injury, or perhaps from the extension to it of the first form. The tip of the finger swells, and throbs with burning pain and pus is soon formed. Unless the abscess is opened early, the pus may burrow into the tendon sheath, thus giving rise to the third form, or even into the substance of the bone, as in the fourth form.

In the third form, the inflammation begins in the sheath that encloses the flexor tendons—those which bend the finger. Unless the pus is evacuated quite early, it destroys the tendon, burrows into the other joints (phalanges), and destroys the finger. It may even extend to and destroy the entire hand. In some cases it has proved fatal.

In the fourth kind,—and this is the kind that is more commonly called a felon,—the inflammation is in the membrane (periosteum) that invests the bone of the first phalanx. It is this periosteum on which the life of the bone depends, and heals it when broken. It can even replace with new bone large portions which may have been removed.

If left to itself, the pus has to work its way to the surface from the very bone itself, the patient suffering unbearable agony for several days and as many sleepless nights. An incision to the bone alone gives relief.

In each form of the whitlow hot applications are helpful. The incision should be performed by a skillful physician, who will avoid arteries and be sure of the location of the pus, for it often seems to be in front. when it is on the back of the bone.

A Bloody Battle Ax.

J. W. Steele, an old pioneer of Mojave, is in the city, and has presented to William Montgomery, of the American exchange, a noted Indian weapon that has caused the death of twelve men. It is a stone battle ax about five inches long by three wide at the thickest part, and tapers both ways to almost a sharp edge. This ax has twelve deeply cut lines in it, indicating the number of men who have fallen by it.

Old Chief Lingona, of the Mojaves, was once the owner of this weapon, and it was he who wielded it with such destruction. He first, while engaged in battle with some emigrants, killed Tom Jarvis, the leader. This was in 1854. In like manner two years later he killed Henry Koch and William Thomson near Fort Yuma, being himself at the time perforated with two pistol balls. Then old Lingona slugged two of his braves who displensed him, and with the exception of John Kincaid, who fell by his hand in 1866, it is not known who the other marks are intended for. Lingona died two years ago, and Mr. Steele secured the weapon from the tribe. He said:

"This old chief was a thoroughly bad Indian. He was in his day on the Mojave desert what Slade was along the line of the Union Pacific, and what Billy the Kid and Wild Bill were. He only made marks on his battle ax for the men he actually killed with it. Those he stabbed or shot he had another way of reckoning. He indicated them by the grizzly bear claws he had strung about his neck.

"This string of bear claws is now kept by his squaw at Mojave, who survives him. It makes me almost shrink back when I see that big string of claws. There must be thirty on it, and if the chief had brought all his dead together there would have been enough for a big graveyard."—San Francisco Chronicle.

The Measures of a Gentleman.

Prof. Thomas Davidson in Dec. Forum.

English gentlemen of 400 years ago considered the pursuit of literature, art and science unworthy of any of their class, which was expected to live solely for sport. American gentlemen (and this includes all Americans) hold the same opinion with regard to all mechanical pursuits. Are such notions a whit less childish than those of 400 years ago? I think they are even more so; for a man may very well be a gentleman without scholarship, but he cannot be one without being able to earn his living by his own labor. The truth is, while we flatter our vanity with the notion that we are an enlightened people, on the ground that we have a form of Government and certain mechanical contrivances which our forefathers had not, we are sunk in barbarism as regards all ideas of human worth. For well-nigh 2,000 years Christianity has taught that character, and not position or possession, gives value to men. We act and think, for the most part, as if teaching had never existed.

She Pays the Conductor.

There is a lady in Atlanta who refuses to put her fare in the boxes of the bobtailed cars, but compels the driver to take the money and put it in himself. He has refused, expostulated and argued with her, and showed her the printed rules, but all to no purpose. She continues to walk to the front door, place the money in his hand and request him to put it in the box. He doesn't know whether the lady is eccentric, wishes to test his honesty, or is too proud to wait on herself.—New York Telegram.

It is no wonder that foreigners consider the English language so difficult to master when we think of the great change that a single letter will make in the pronunciation of it. The letter c changes lover to clover, d makes a crow a crowd, k makes eyed keyed, g changes a son into a song, l transforms a pear into a pearl, s changes a hoe into a shoe, t makes bough bought, w makes omen into women.

We desire again to sound a note of warning to those who are about to invest money in assessment life insurance concerns, or mutual associations without reserve funds to back up their contracts. Many of these concerns, full of promise at the start, have come to grief. Many a man who has been paying assessments month after month is doomed to disappointment, and will find he has but a broken reed to depend upon.

For generations a certain Japanese family had a box into which they put percentages. Said one of them: "If I want to buy a garment that costs $1, I buy it for 80 cents; or give a feast that would cost $5 I give it for $4; or to build a house for $100, I build it for $80, and put the balances in the box. At the end of the year we meet, open the boxes, and give the contents to the poor. It costs some self-denial, but we are always prosperous and happy." Washington Happenings.

The secretary of the interior has been engaged for some time in clearing up a multitude of small cases on appeal from the commissioner of the general land office involving lands in the Fergus Falls land district and lying within the grant made to the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railroad and also within the indemnity limits of the St. Paul & Northern Pacific railroad. In the cases of the former road against Eqquin, Herbranson, Olsen, Smith, Greenwold and against Graurud, the commissioner has affirmed the decision of the general land office giving the lands to the settlers on the ground that they had settled upon the land prior to its withdrawal from the public domain.

The residents of Seattle, Wash., have petitioned the senate for the admission of Washington Territory as a state under the name of Washington. They suggest that "this name has never in theory or practice been associated with failure." Whenever congress shall be ready to admit the territory as a state there will be a very strong pressure against the use of the name of Washington. The residents of Washington city here have already entered a protest that such a designation of the new state would tend to a great confusion, and they would undoubtedly be joined in this protest by the postoffice department, which is opposed to a duplication of names of states and territories.

Record of Casualties.

During a crowded mass meeting of citizens at Port Arthur to discuss the mayoralty, the Odd Fellows, who were meeting above the public hall, stamped their feet in applause. The citizens below thought it was the roof falling in and a serious panic ensued. A rush was made for the door, chairs being smashed and men trampled upon. The audience had nearly all reached the sidewalk before the cause of the disturbance was know. A number of people were badly bruised, but none fatally injured.

On Friday, Jan. 4, a large mass of rock fell from the precipice of the Horse Shoe, or Canadian falls at Niagara and on Saturday night at 10 o'clock another mass broke away. In both cases the noise made by the falling rock alarmed the residents in the vicinity on the Canadian side. The massive stone building known as the Table Rock house was jarred to such a degree that the doors were thrown open, and the occupants who had retired jumped out of bed greatly excited by unusual noise and vibration of the building, resembling a severe shock of an earthquake. The same sensations were experienced at the residence of Gatekeeper Whistler on Cedar island; and also half a mile up the river where Gardner McCameron lives. The effect of these displacements on the contour of the falls is quite marked, the change being to form an angle to the original horseshoe.

Personal Talk.

James G. Blaine arrived in Washington the other day from New York. Mr. Phelps and Mr Blaine were driven to Richmond, where Mr. Phelps has a suit of apartments and where Mr. Blaine will be his guest for several days. Mr. Blaine said that he had come to Washington on no political business. He he had come to arrange with some builders to put up a house on some property near Dupont circle. He will build this house to rent. He said he would remain for a few days, and that when he left it would be to go to Indianapolis to call on Mr. Harrison.

Man's Wicked Doings.

Mike Shannon, who but recently had his nose bitten off in a row in Ladow's restaurant at Two Harbors, Minn., was shot and killed by Frank Alger, a contractor. Shannon was under the influence of liquor and went into Alger's house and caused a disturbance.

At Delaware, Pa., William Degan, alias Keely, the proprietor of a barber shop, and Bernhardt Gehan were arrested for manufacturing counterfeit money. Beneath the floor of the barber shop there were found a counterfeiter's outfit. In a coal bin adjacent to the barber shop there was found a canvass sack filled with new dollars.

It is learned that Pinkerton's detectives recovered only $800 out of the $12,000 stolen from Paymaster McClure by his murderers in Pennsylvania. The remainder is supposed to be in possession of "Red Nose" Mike's accomplices, who have fled to Italy and who are pursued by Pinkerton men. The murderers divided the money among themselves at Philadelphia a few days after the crime.

The jail officials at Omaha say that Libbie Biechler is becoming insane. Gen. Cowin, her lawyer, says she was insane when she killed Harry King, and that she has been steadily getting worse ever since. The county physician expresses the same opinion. No one is permitted to see her except her attorney and the jail attendants. All visitors are kept away from her cell, and are even excluded from the corridor in which her cell is located.

James Stewart, who has long been suspected by the police at Fargo of being a crook, was arrested on suspicion of having robbed the Moorhead postoffice some weeks ago. The clue that led to his arrest was the discovery of a bloody piece of a handkerchief in the postoffice with his initials on it which matched a torn handkerchief Stewart sent to a laundry a short time afterward. He is supposed to have cut his head with glass while entering the rear window of the postoffice, and tore a piece from his handkerchief to bind up the wound.

Dr J. H. Nyer, the oldest dentist of Hazelton, Pa., shot and killed his wife and then committed suicide by placing the muzzle of a revolver at his temple and sending a bullet into his brain. The death of both was instantaneous. The deed was evidently a premeditated double suicide by the doctor and his wife. The latter was an invalid for a number of years and suffered considerably from an incurable disease. The doctor had a large practice, and all the money he made was spent in attempts to obtain relief for his wife from her malady. They had no children.

The postoffice in Grand Rapids, Mich., was robbed of $500 worth of stamps and a box containing a number of registered letters. The janitor completed his work in the evening, and left a window open to air the place. Five minutes later the deputy postmaster entered to lock up the vault for the night. He found the vault door open and the property gone. The thief had evidently entered through the window, taken what he could lay hands on and left hurriedly. Seven thousand dollars' worth of stamps and half a dozen registered pouches were left undisturbed.

A detective from Chicago arrived at St. Louis with requisition papers for Thomas W. Vines, who came there in a trunk after robbing the Adams-Westlake Company of Chicago of over $4,000. William Mangler, manager of the city department of the firm, came down with the detective. Both proceeded to the office of the chief of police, where the money taken from Vines was turned over to them. They counted it out in Chief Huebler's office and found that it footed up $3,031. Mr. Mangler states that $4,000 was the amount stolen by Vines, so that the package is $129 short.

Coroner Babbitt, of Birmingham, Ala., began the investigation of a case of suspected wife and child murder which may rival the Hawes horror. A man living in a suburban town is suspected of having poisoned his wife and daughter with rough on rats in order that he might marry again. The bodies of the woman and child will be exhumed and a post mortem held. No arrests have yet been made, and the man has no idea that he is under suspicion. He is making arrangements for his wedding, which is to take place soon. His wife and child have been dead about ten days.

Rev. Fielder Isral, pastor of the First Unitarian church, was found dead in his study in the church at Salem, Minn., having committed suicide by cutting his throat with a razor while temporarily insane. He had been unsettled mentally since the burning of the steamer Maryland, on which he was a passenger, barely escaping with his life. He was sixty-two years old, and has been pastor of the First church since 1887, coming from Baltimore. He was prominent in Masonic circles, being a member of Starr King lodge, Washington Royal Arch chapter, and was past high priests, and also chaplain of the grand lodge of Massachusetts.

Advices from Salmonville, Ariz., says James Lassiter, foreman of the Chihuahua Cattle company's camp on the Bonita, tributary of the Gila river, has arrived, and brings news of trouble between the company's men and some Mexican sheep men from Apache county, which resulted in the killing of at least three Mexicans. It states Mexicans have been grazing a flock of sheep near the company's range, which brought on trouble, and that the Mexicans ambushed some of the company's men. It seems, however, none of the latter were killed, while it is probably all the sheep men met their deaths. An under-sheriff and coroner have gone to the scene of the trouble.

A very serious shooting affray occurred in Brainerd, Minn., in which Policeman Lewis was seriously if not fatally, wounded. He received his injury in attempting to arrest two young toughs, Fred and John McNaughton, who were severely beating a man by the name of St. Clair, against whom they had a grudge. The McNaughtons had attempted to give St. Clair a beating early in the evening but had been stopped by others, at which time they drew revolvers and threatened to shoot anybody who interfered. St. Clair however was gotten away from them and put to bed in a room over the saloon. Upon discovering St. Clair's whereabouts they went to his room, forced open the door and began to beat him unmercifully, when Policeman Lewis interfered and was shot by Fred McNaughton for his pains.

At Bellevue hospital New York there was told a story of cruelty at sea which seems almost incredible, and in which the facts may have been exaggerated by the victim's excited mental condition. The story was told by Ernest Heider, a German lad of sixteen. He said: "Last March Capt. Freese agreed to take me on his vessel as cabin boy and I left for London with him. Scarcely had we left the dock at London when Capt. Freese began to abuse me. Without apparent cause he would beat me most unmercifully with the end of a rope several times a day. When the captain got tired licking me he would throw the rope's end to the mate, Fred Schultz, and with a loud oath, commanded him to beat me. Strips of skin and flesh were torn off my legs and shoulders. The food I received was horrible. I do not know how I lived on it. The meat was actually rotten. When the salt waves struck my torn flesh the pain was terrible. I was shown no mercy. I would have jumped overboard only the captain and mate watched me too closely.

A man named Jones went to Helena, Mont., from Butte. He bought a lot in the residence portion of Helena for $900, agreeing to pay for it next day, Jan. 2. That day he went to the First National bank with the man he bought the lot of and presented a draft on the Traders' National Bank of Spokane Falls for $2,500. He told the cashier that to save the trouble of identification he had his signature sent over from the Butte bank. The cashier found the signature all right and referred to the records, where he found the same signature in connection with business done in November, when Jones had drafts cashed for several large amounts. The cashier at once cashed the drafts, at Jones' request retaining $900 to pay for the lot on the presentation of the deed and paying Jones $1,600 in cash. Jones left town that day and has not been heard of since. Next day the seller of the lot called at the bank, deposited the deed and received $900, Jones having previously requested the cashier to hold the deed until he called for it. Then the bank received notice from its Spokane Falls exchange that the draft in question was originally made out for $25, and had been raised to $2,500.

From Foreign Lands.

A terrible disaster has happened at Sabumtschi, near Tiflis, in Russia. A train became blocked in an immense snowdrift, and, before aid could be sent, fourteen passengers perished from intense cold, and twenty others were badly frost bitten. A relief party which started out to rescue the imperiled passengers lost their way and died in the snow.

The Cologne Gazette renews its attack on Sir R. D. Morier. It says: "It is unconceivable that Sir Robert Moreir's name should occur to Marshal Bazaine in 1886 unless Sir Robert had been expressly mentioned to him as the source of his information." The Gazette prints a copy of a telegram from Napoleon at Metz to Marshal Bazaine which contained news of the intended movements of the German army, and insinuates that Sir Robert Morier communicated the fact that those movements were about to be made to Empress Eugenie. The Post withdraws the allegation of forgery made against Sir R. D. Morier.

News Generalities.

John M. Lingle, postmaster of Webb City, Mo., committed suicide by shooting himself though the brain with a revolver. During the day J. J. Nelson, postoffice inspector, had examined the accounts of the office and found a shortage of $230.

The conference between the officials of the Burlington road and the striking engineers and firemen was concluded at Chicago. It was decided that the strike should be declared off, the terms of the settlement being agreeable to both the railroad officials and the engineers and firemen. The latter declined to make any statement except that everything had been settled amicably. It is said that one of the items agreed upon was that the strikers would not be blacklisted, and that they should be given employment as fast as the vacancies occurred.

Distress is said to prevail in a settlement in the Pembina mountain, Dakota. Mr. Riches of Park River had secured a lot of clothing and provisions which he sent out to be distributed among the settlers, selecting two reliable men to take charge of the articles. The men had just returned and reported the condition in which they found the people. They distributed the goods as fairly as they could among fifteen families and said they knew of between forty and fifty equally destitute families. In these are an average of five or six little ones to a family, without pants, coats, dresses, stockings, shoes, caps, mittens or anything but a few old rags. They are mainly Lutherans and because uncomplaining their real condition was unknown. Most of them have been living on a porridge made by cooking up their frozen green wheat and oats, stuff not fit to feed a hog on. One family had not seen any flour for six weeks.

John Wolter, a submarine diver, narrowly escaped death while repairing the bottom of a vessel in the Schuylkill river. He had been at work about half an hour when it was discovered that something was wrong. An alarm was given and the three men on the boat pulled up the slack rope and drew up the diver. The rope had become entangled about the man's feet and he came to the surface feet first. Wolter in his diving suit weighs 400 pounds and the three men were unable to pull them out of the water. They shouted for help, but before it arrived Wolter had gone to the bottom again, head first. Two men came and the suffocating man was once more brought up, and the mens united efforts could not get him on the scow, and for the second time the diver went down. The cries of the men at last brought a number of hands from a saw mill and Wolter's face had turned black and was horibly swollen, and it was thought he was dead. After the expiration of fifteen minutes there were signs of returning life, and shortly after the man opened his eyes and spoke. The cause of the accident was carelessness in adjusting the air hose to the back of the helmet, from which it became detached.

Murchison Found at Last.

A mystery as to the real name of Murchison, the now famous Pomona correspondent of Lord Sackville, was cleared away at Los Angels, Cal., and the announcement made on authority of those who have been in secret from the first that George Osgoodby of Pomona was the author of the Murchison letter. Mr. Osgoodby is a native of New York, is thirty-four years of age; his father is an Englishman by birth, and resides in Pomona, as does also his brother. Murchison is his family name, and is attached to that of Osgoodby by marriage.

The author is a citizen of Pomona, a man of good repute and of family, a fruit farmer and owner of considerable property. He has lived in Pomona a number of years. His parents and brother also reside there. He is of Scotch-English parentage, but was born in the United States, a native of New York. He has been a teacher and appears to be an extensive reader and close student, especially of political affairs. From frequent expression it has been ascertained that he entertains a strong antipathy to English government. All accounts, all testimony to show that George Osgoodby himself conceived the idea of writing decoy letters to Sackville West, as well as to other British statesmen, for the purpose of eliciting from them expressions of opinion regarding the leading political parties and candidates in the United States with intent to use it for the benefit of the Republican party.

THE DEADLY CYCLONE

How it Let itself Loose in Pennsylvania and Killed and Mangled Many People.

AT READING, PA.

READING, PA, Jan. 9.—This was the saddest night in the history of Reading. A death-like pall hangs upon the city as the result of the most horrible disaster in its history. A hundred households are in mourning as the result of one of the greatest calamities in Pennsylvania. A cyclone swept over the northern section of the city this afternoon and laid waste everything within its reach and with a terrible loss of life. The lives that have been sacrificed and the number that have been injured can only be estimated. The most reliable computation is that not less than sixty persons have been killed outright and 100 injured. How this terrible calamity occurred is about as follows:

It was raining very hard all morning. Towards noon it ceased almost entirely and by 4 o'clock there was every indication that there would be entire cessation of the rain storm. Half an hour afterwards bright sun made every effort to penetrate the clouds. The tints of a rainbow were seen in the eastern sky. It portended a beautiful sunset. There was a clear sky overhead. This continued for half an hour longer. Then the scene changed with a suddenness that was appalling. The fleecy clouds gave way to the ominous signs of a coming storm. Dark heavy clouds marshaled themselves toward the town and soon a gloom seemed to have settled over the city. There was a stillness as of coming danger. Then the wind whistled, roared and tore in mad confusion. The storm clouds grew heavier still and louder roared the wind. In the western sky the storm was seen approaching with a thundering noise. The swath it cut was narrow, but its effect was terrible. Persons residing along the track of the storm say that they saw the first signs of danger in a funnel-shaped maelstrom which seemed to gather up everything within its reach and cast it right and left. Out in the country houses and barns were unroofed, farm outbuildings were overturned, crops uprooted and destruction spread in every direction. The track of the destructive element was not more than two hundred feet wide, and it is lucky that it only touched the suburbs of the city.

Meanwhile the rain poured down in torrents. The atmosphere became heavy and oppressive, and it was almost as dark as night. Directly on one side the track of the Reading railroad was situated the paint shops of the company. It was a one-story building about 60 by 150 feet in size. Here about thirty men were employed in painting passenger cars. There were eight or nine of these cars in the building. They had been built at the company's shops in this city at a cost of $6,000 each. The building was struck squarely in the middle, and the bricks scattered about as if they were playthings. The cars were turned topsy turvy, while the men were buried under the debris. Some of the bricks were carried away. The chamber of each of the passenger cars was already filled with gas, as they were ready to be taken out on the road in a few days. They exploded one after another with the fearful bang of cannon. Bang, bang, bang, they resounded over the city, causing the people to run out from their houses, thinking it was the sound of an earthquake. There was a considerable quantity of gasoline in the building and this added fuel to the flames. A sheet of flame shot upward with the roar of musketry. Some twenty of the men had a chance to crawl out of the debris, but four of their companions were enveloped in the flames.

While this was all going on the storm was traveling forward with fearful rapidity. It must have traveled at the rate of one hundred miles an hour. It struck some more private houses and unroofed a dozen private residences. The huge sheets of tin were carried half a square away and deposited in a lot. Then the storm proceeded in its full fury. Directly in its path, at the corner of Twelfth and Marion streets, stood the Reading silk mill, one of the industries of the city in which the citizens took the greatest pride. Here about 175 happy girls were working. The building was a huge structure, most substantially built, four stories in height and had a basement besides. It occupied an entire block of ground. The size of the building itself was nearly 300 feet in length and about 150 feet wide. It was surmounted by a massive tower, fully 100 feet from the ground. The funnel-shaped storm cloud struck the building directly in the center on its broadest side, which faced the west. It fell to pieces, as if composed of so many building blocks. Nearly two hundred human beings went down in the awful wreck. Human tongues can never tell the terrible scenes of that hour. The walls gave way, the floors fell down, one on top of the other, and carried their great mass of human beings to the bottom. The bricks were piled up in the greatest confusion while, amid the hurricane and whistling, rushing, roaring wind, terrible cries for succor were sent up to heaven. It was a moment that tried men's souls, and almost simultaneous with the fall of the building came the awful cries for relief. Girls with blackened faces, bruised and broken limbs, their clothing tattered and torn, dragged themselves from the ruins. So probably 75 to 100 escaped, or were dragged out by their friends. These, of course, worked on the upper floors, and were thrown near the top of the debris. At some place the bricks were piled twenty feet deep, and underneath are lying to-night human bodies by the score. About 250 girls and young women are usually employed in the mill, but at 4 o'clock about eighty were relieved from duty for the day. They returned to their homes before the storm came. The most reliable estimate of to-night places the number in the building when it went down in the neighborhood of 175, and, as before stated, 100 of these were rescued by friends or dragged themselves out immediately after the accident. The alarm for relief was immediately sent out, and in a short time thousands of citizens arrived to help out the dead and dying. The scene was a harrowing one and beggars description.

The work of rescue will be pushed all night, but it may be far into to-morrow before all the bodies are taken out. The rescuers still have the greatest hopes that some of those inside are still living, and there is every reason for saving them, and the persons who believe that way are right. All is chaos and confusion around the mill. The managers are missing, and the correct number is merely guess work. It may not be over forty, and then again, at this hour, there is a likelihood that it will reach sixty or eighty.

THE STORM AT PITTSBURG.

PITTSBURG, PA., Jan. 9.—A terrible storm of wind and hail, the worse known for years, swept over the city shortly afternoon to-day, carrying with it death and destruction. The storm was formed with a suddenness that was overwhelming, and as the wind, accompanied by hail and torrents of rain, swept along the streets, pedestrians were hurled before it, and barely escaped being crushed under vehicles passing along the thoroughfare. Suddenly, in the center of the city, there was a terrible crash, and a few minutes later the central fire alarm sounded from the corner of Diamond and Wood streets. Hundreds of people hurried to the scene, when it was found that the cyclone had caught the new building on Diamond street, owned by C. L. Willey, and hurled it to the earth, covering up two score of human bodies.

Within five minutes after the collapse of the building the streets were filled with an excited crowd, notwithstanding the fact that the rain and hail was pouring down in a perfect deluge. With the arrival of the firemen the work of rescue was begun. Ladders were run up to the second and third stories of the Weldin building and the first one taken out was a young lady employed as a typewriter, who fortunately had escaped serious injury. Crowds of willing hands eagerly took up the work of rescue, and every little while fresh localities where men had been caught were found. At the time of the disaster about twenty-five men were at work on the building and none escaped injury. The list of dead identified up to 11 o'clock was as follows: Samuel Stringer, aged sixteen years, printer; Thomas Jones, bricklayer; Charles Fritch, aged sixteen years; George Mason, carpenter; colored boy named Tergge, bootblack in the barber shop; George Kirsche, barber, aged eighteen years. The remains of one man have not yet been identified. Inspector of Police McAleese stated at a late hour to-night that he was of the opinion that from fifteen to twenty-five persons are in the ruins, and he would not be surprised if the death list would be incrensed to fifteen or twenty. Forty mangled and bruised bodies have been taken from the ruins.

AT SUNBURY, PA.

SUNBURY, PA. Jan. 9.—A terrible accident occurred in this city to-day. A rain and wind storm came up suddenly and blew over two of the stacks of the Sunbury nail mill. They crashed through the roof, completely demolishing the puddling department of the mill. Thirty-five men were employed in this department, and half of them were buried in the debris. The fire alarm was sounded and hundreds surrounded the mill. Men were carried out half-naked and men are at work yet and it is supposed several others are in the ruins.

THE READING HORROR.

READING, PA., Jan. 10.—There is mourning and sorrow in many households in Reading to-day. A pall of death hangs over the city. Fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, relatives and friends are grief-stricken over the wreck of last night. Over one hundred spirits are hushed forever in death, as a result of the wreck and ruin wrought in this city by the storm. The cyclone left the entire city in darkness, which was only relieved by the electric lights and hence bonfires which shed their lurid glare on the scene of death. All night long brave and willing hands assisted in the work of rescue of the dead. The disaster is fully as bad as reported in these dispatches last night. The list of fatal cases will fully reach one hundred, and may be more. The hospitals and undertakers' establishments are filled with victims. The physicians are all busy, and many private houses have been opened for the accommodation of the injured. When the first grey streaks of early morning appeared it portrayed beautifully a smiling sun, and everything was directly in contrast with the fury of last night. To-day all is again bright and glorious in the heavens, as though mocking the work of last night. The

was greatly retarded from the singular manner in which the silk mill collapsed. It did not blow over, but was badly crushed down. Falling in upon itself, in one mass, not a vestige of the walls are remaining standing above the stone foundation. The rafters and timbers of the flooring projected in all directions. As the building was steam-heated, the ruins did not take fire. Otherwise not one of the other unfortunates could possibly have escaped death in the most appalling form. Teams of every description, omnibuses, funeral coaches, fire wagons, hospital vans and private vehicles, were pressed into service and were running rapidly to and from the scene of the disaster all night long, bearing bodies of the wounded, dying and dead to their homes or to the different hospitals. From the statement of some of those who escaped from the building it appears to have gone down in an instant. There was a loud crash of breaking timber, and persons in the mill all rushed toward the main doors. A good many succeeded in getting out, while four girls saved themselves by jumping from the second-story windows. The first rumbling noise was followed by the falling of the building, the upper stories going first with their human load. Had it not been for the fact that but few of the hands were on the third and fourth floors at the time scarcely a life would have been saved. Mr. George Grinshaw, one of the proprietors of the mill, who was in the office at the time, and having received several severe wounds on the head, stated that there were, to the best of his knowledge, about two hundred and seventy-five persons, principally girls and boys, in the establishment at the time of the occurrence. A reporter was at the silk mill ruins all night and witnessed some of the most heart-rending scenes it probably ever befell a human being to witness. Relatives and friends were running about in their frenzy and grief, seeking for lost ones, and almost deranged. This morning eight more bodies were taken from the ruins. The confusion is great and a full list of the dead and injured is not yet in the hands of any one. Exactly how many more bodies are in the ruins is a matter of conjecture. Considerable money has been contributed for the relief of the sufferers. Benefits are also being arranged. The latest list of the killed has been reduced to fifty, but this is uncertain, as no one knows how many human beings lie buried beneath the mountain of brick, mortar and timber.

Sir Robert Morier, the British minister to Russia, is in a curious fix. The Cologne Gazette accused him of having, when minister Darmstad during the year of 1870, given the French information of the movements of the German troops, and cited Bazaine as the authority. To this, Morier made answer that it was an old story, and that he had Bazaine's denial in writing that there was a word of truth in it. He then wrote to Count Herbert Bismarck asking him to contradict it officially, or rather, to say something publicly which would show that the German court gave no credence to it. This Count Herbert refuses to do, and shelters himself under the peremptory tone of Sir Robert's letter. Sir Robert Morier evidently does not know how to conduct controversies discreetly, but nobody supposes he will suffer from this one personally. What it shows is the anxiety of Prince Bismarck's partisans to justify the position taken in his report to the present emperor on the publication of the Emperor Frederick's diary—that the latter was not trusted during the war with important state secrets, because the English court sympathized with the French.

The police of Omaha captured W. F. Bohanan, aged twenty-three, who is wanted at Rusk, Tex., where he was serving a life sentence for the murder of Lee Knox, his mother's hired man, seven years ago. Knox accused him of criminal intimacy with his wife, and in the quarrel which followed Bohanan shot him dead and buried his body in the field. Through tools smuggled to his cell he escaped and came to Omaha. His capture was the result of a letter written to his mother.

Arrest of Chicago Editors.

Capt. Schaack and Inspector Bonfield swore out warrants before Justice R. H. White of Chicago for the arrest of James J. West, publisher, and Joseph R. Dunlop, city editor of the times, for criminal libel. The warrants set forth that the defendants, "did unlawfully, maliciously, write, print and cause to be published a certain false, scandalous, malicious, defamatory libel of and concerning the said John Bonfield, on the 4th of January, 1889," etc. It was past 6 o'clock when the officers found Mr. Dunlop in his room, and the warrant was read to him. He requested that the officers delay further action until he might have the opportunity to consult his attorney, find bondsmen, and give bail. This was denied him. Inspector Bonfield told the officers to perform their duty according to instructions, take their prisoner to the Harrison street station and lock him up. The instructions were followed to the letter. On arriving at the station Mr. Dunlop was thrown into a cell, and treated otherwise with exceeding scant courtesy. The space behind the bars in which Mr. Dunlop was confined is narrow, dark and noisome—one of the pens which hold daily an assortment of criminals from some of the worst quarters in the city. Mr. Dunlop was literally in durance vile. "Bonfield and Schaack," said Mr. Dunlop, "were simply trying to get even with me, that's all. The manner in which my arrest was made is proof conclusive that they are attempting to act in as unfair a manner as they can. I was just preparing to go to my dinner when the officers arrived and placed me under arrest, and I was hustled off without the least opportunity to arrange my affairs or notify my family." At the time Mr. Dunlop was arrested Mr. West had just gone to dinner. The fact of his city editors arrest and the issuance of a warrant for himself was telephoned to him at his residence, and he immediately started down town to give himself up. He was cordially greeted by Mr. Dunlop and the other friends and the same gentlemen who went on Mr. Dunlop's bonds also signed those of Mr. West, which were in the same amount. No sooner had Mr. West and Mr. Dunlop been released than they were again placed under arrest. The charge was the same, but in this case the complainant was Capt. Schaack. Bonds were promptly furnished on the second charge, and the two editors were allowed to leave the station.

The Great Sioux Reservation.

Chairman Peel, of the house Indian committee reported favorably the bill to amend the act providing for opening the great Sioux reservation. The peculiarity of the report presented in pencil copy to the house is that it makes a surprising attack upon the Northern Pacific and Chicago & Northwestern railroads, claiming that they have been instrumental in preventing the opening of the reservation, and have in common with the cattle syndicates and "squaw men," been responsible for preventing the opening of the reservation.

It was stated at the interior department however that it was known that the roads had not in any way contributed to the failure of the Sioux commission, and it was generally believed that the railroads were sincere in the effort they had made to get the reservation opened. The committee report says:

The Sioux Indians are completely under the control of a few arrogant and self-conceited chiefs and these chiefs are largely under the control of the Northern Pacific and Northwestern railroad companies and a few avaricious white or squaw men, who, with a few chiefs, are reaping large fortunes from the common property of their own people. The Northern Pacific railroad company, as we are advised, own large amounts of real estate in Dakota that they desire to sell at profitable figures, and if this bill should become a law thereby open up 11,000,000 acres to settlers at nominal figures compared with the prices they ask for theirs, the market for their lands will be closed for many years to come. So they, with their mighty power, oppose the bill. The Northwestern Railroad company, running to Pierre on the Missouri river, is interested, so we are advised, in another road that runs around this great reservation to the Black Hills and does all the carrying trade for this vast section. To open up this reservation would not only compel the Northwestern to complete its own line through to the Black Hills, a thing they do not want to do, but it forces the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul and other competing lines through. Therefore they oppose the measure. The committee recommends that the bill pass and asks congress to give these Indians all the land they can use and teach them that governments are not created to support them, but to protect them, and that, like other people, they must work.

The Sugar Refinery Swindle.

The sugar refinery swindle, which has given inventors in New York and across the pond an electric shock during the last few days, still remains a chief topic of discussion. The strange aspects of the great fraud have resulted in several wild theories. Prominent among these is the suggestion that Prof. Freund may not be dead. The funeral on that blizzard day, and the fact that the cemetery records of burial are said to be wanting gives rumor a semblance of probability. In view of this great fraud and the people connected with it, the following article from the New York Sun of July 29, 1876, makes interesting reading:

Henry Cotterill of London, who had enjoyed an unimpeached reputation and numbered among his clients many great mercantile houses, came to New York about five years ago and opened an office at No. 31 Nassau street, and his European reputation, his knowledge of mercantile law and his familiarity with the practice of British courts won for him a good array of clients—English merchants, widows, pensioners and others having claims originated abroad. Then Mr. Cotterill enlarged the sphere of his operations and undertook the investment of money belonging to his clients. Within the past five weeks Mr. Cotterill has been rarely found in his office, still he satisfactorily explained away his absence, saying that he had urgent business in Boston and elsewhere. One of his most confiding clients, who had given him charge of $22,000 for reinvestment, was a Maj. Patterson, late of the British army, a veteran who had retired from the service and came to America to find a home for himself and his aged mother. Distrustful of the lawyer, the major went to Boston and found him. Cotterill apologized gracefully, and said that he would return to New York at once and hand him over his money. He did return to the city, but when the major called at the lawyer's office it was empty. Then the major hurried to Cotterill's family home and found that also vacated. On Saturday Jan. 5, Mrs. Cotterill, who is an educated and well born woman, and her eight children took passage in the steerage in the England, their tickets having been provided by contributions raised by the rector of the church she attended, her husband having left her wholly destitute. Cotterill has gone away with over $40,000.

Maj. Patterson and his mother are both dead.

A Great Sheehan's Troubles.

Senator Morgan has not yet drawn up his report to the full committee on the action of the special subcommittee which investigated the condition of affairs at White Earth agency, Minnesota. Senator Morgan was very anxious to get back to White Earth with his committee the past summer, but found the extended session of congress and the consideration of the fisheries treaty opposed to such a course. He also considered the subject of fetching a number of witnesses here, but this was abandoned, and it seems quite likely that no report will be made and that Agent Sheehan, who it was thought at one time would be removed, will retain his place throughout this administration. Col. Painter, of the Indian Rights association, who has just returned from a trip to Minnesota, says Sheehan has not been very popular with the Indians, but believes that he has always tried to do his duty. "The difficulty lies," said Col. Painter, "in the fact that our Indians are becoming civilized and educated, and there are now being found among them many men of intelligence who cannot stand the constant dictation of the agents. The latter are clothed with almost despotic power, and in many cases have not the tact to use it properly. They treat good and bad Indians alike, and the result is the Indians of intelligence resent it. I think this has been the trouble at White Earth.

A meeting of Panama canal bondholders have addressed a letter to M. De Lesseps, offering him the chairmanship of a new canal company, to be formed by shareholders in the present company. The Paris Journal says the new company will have a capital of several million francs, and will take over the concern from the old Panama company.

Minnesota Legislature.

Preparatory to the organization of the Minnesota Legislature, the following officers were agreed upon in a Republican Caucus of the House: Speaker, Charles H. Graves; Chief Clerk, C. P. Carpenter; First assistant, C. H. Slocum; Second assistant, C. A. French; Enrolling clerk, F. L. Krayenbuhl; Engrossing clerk, Gilbert Gutterson; Postmaster, S. O. Morse; Sergeant-at-arms, C. A. Baxter; Assistant sergeant-at-arms, C. G. Hunt; Chaplain, Rev. W. H. Harrington.

The Senate caucus put in nomination the following officers; Secretary, O. L. Cutler; Assistant Secretary, B. W. Day; Engrossing Clerk, A. H. Bartram; Enrolling Clerk, W. C. Whiteman; Sergeant-at-arms, Clark Chambers; Chaplain, Rev. E. R. Lathrop.

Tuesday, Jan. 8.

The Twenty-sixth legislature of the State of Minnesota is now in session, having formally organized at noon to-day as provided by law. The organization was effected by the election of the officers nominated in the Republican caucuses the evening before. Neither house transacted any business further than to prepare the way for the work that is to follow.

Wednesday, January 9.

SENATE.—Mr. Day offered a joint resolution inviting Henry George to address the legislature on the subject of "Single Taxation." The invitation was extended. Senator Marcus Johnson introduced a bill authorizing Kandiyohi county to issue bonds to the amount of $20,000 for the erection of a court house, and it was forthwith passed. This was all the business transacted.

HOUSE.—There was a quorum of the house present when Speaker Graves for the first time called it together yesterday at 10 o'clock, and more came in later. The chaplain was absent and so the work of yesterday was unblessed. The approaching joint session made it impossible to undertake any business of importance, and all that took place was the appointment of Oscar Ackerman, son of Representative Ackerman of Young America and Charles L. Chase of St. Paul as pages.

Thursday, Jan. 10.

SENATE.—Mr. Holmes introduced a bill providing for the furnishing of seed grain to farmers in the counties where the crops of last year were a total or partial failure.

The president announced the following committees:

Judiciary—Goodrich, Ives, Eaton, Edwards, Scheffer, Ward, Daniels, Day, Child, Halvorsen, Bowen.

Finance—Buckman, Crandall, Hoard, Oswald, Smith.

Elections—Wallmark, Whiteman, Burkhard, Goodrich, Child.

Claims—Thacker, Eaton, Dodge, Lende, Pope.

Education—Swenson, Hoard, Day, Hayden, Nachbar.

Public Lands—Johnson, M., Compton, Truax, Sampson, Anderson, Hayden, Whiteman.

Internal Improvements—Lende, Wood, Hall, Burkhard, Bowen.

Federal Relations—Chapman, Johnson, T., Wallmark, Nachbar, Hayden.

Agriculture—Dodge, Chapman, Hoard, Shields, Thacker.

Military Affairs—Ives, Edwards, Daniels, Child, Nelson.

Insurance—Ward, Scheffer, Sampson, Goodrich, Pope, Welch, Child.

Banks—Compton, Brown, Ward, Smith, Welch.

Enrollment—Brown, Finseth, Lende, Truax, Nelson.

Retrenchment and Reform—Welch, Wallmark, Hixon, Halvorsen, Burkhardt.

Tree Culture—Kellar, Anderson, Bowen, Oswald, Clark.

Roads and Bridges—Day, Halvorsen, Johnson, M., Compton, Kellar.

Normal Schools—Scheffer, Holmes, Hayden, Dodge, Pope.

Geology and Natural History Survey—Eaton, Clough, Johnson, M., Brown, Gibson.

Corporations—Johnson, T., Ives, Swenson, Durant, Nelson.

HOUSE.—Mr. Flynn moved that the house concur in the senate's resolution of invitation to Henry George, and this was agreed to after a division. Mr. Keys introduced an amendment to the election law. The feature of the bill is that it provides for the Australian or secret system of voting, so often described in these columns, and so eagerly desired by the agitators of election reforms and the purity of the ballot. There have been laws passed in several states which have adopted this system in a more or less modified form. In the preparation of this bill the laws passed in New York, Michigan, Massachusetts and several other states are copied.

Friday Jan. 11.

SENATE—not in session.

HOUSE.—A number of local bills were introduced, and also a number of resolutions—one relating to rules and another by Mr. Hoyt of Red Wing, which was of a joint character, providing for the appointment of a committee of five consisting of two senators and three representatives, who should at once visit the penitentiary at Stillwater and examine into the condition of the convicts and report upon it, and also upon the labor and employment question. Still another was the usual one authorizing the chief clerk to subscribe for seven daily papers for each member. Mr. Benson thought the old system ought to be radically changed, and so gave notice of debate.

Love, Law and Husbands.

There is something inconsistent in the connection of love, law and husbands. If a woman's husband is killed in a railroad accident she can only receive $5,000 for his life as a compensation for loss of a companion, support and the other good things a husband is supposed to represent. But if in a year or so afterward some gay deceiver trifles with the dear creature's affection, gets her consent to again enter the marriage state and then jilts her, $25,000 is demanded and sometimes granted to heal her wounds. All this goes to show that a sound expectancy is much more valuable than a mangled and dead husband to the ordinary woman.

CONGRESSIONAL.

Weekly Resume of the Proceedings of the Senate and House.

Mon day, Jan. 7.

SENATE.—On motion of Mr. Allison the existing order as to the vote on the tariff bill was extended by the senate for one day, in consequence of this day's session having been occupied by the Panama canal resolution, so that the vote on the tarriff bill is to be taken on Jan. 22 at 1 o'clock.

The senate adopted the joint resolution relating to Panama. The vote was 49 to 3—Messrs. Blackburn, Hampton and Vance voting in the negative. The resolution reads: Resolved, That the government of the United States will look with serious concern and disapproval upon any connection of any European government with the construction or control of any ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien or across Central America, and must regard any such connection or control as injurious to the just rights and interests of the United States and as a menace to their welfare. That the president be and is hereby requested to communicate this expression of the views of the government of the United States to the governments of the countries of Europe.

HOUSE.—The house committee on invalid pensions to-day agreed to report favorably a bill to increase the pensions of disabled veterans. Under this bill the pensions will be increased as follows: For the loss of an arm above the elbow, the pensions will be increased from $36 to $42; for the loss of an arm below the elbow, the pension is increased from $30 to $36; for the loss of an arm at the shoulder, the pension is increased from $45 to $50. The increases provided for the loss of the leg are the same. In cases of total inability to perform manual labor the pension is increased to $50, and for the loss of both arms and legs the pension is increased to $60.

The Sundry civil appropriation bill was completed to-day by the house committee on appropriations. It carries an aggregate appropriation of $22,852,996, being $6,721,451 less than the regular and special estimates and $3,760,008 less than the appropriation for the current fiscal year.

Tuesday, Jan. 8.

SENATE.—A bill was introduced by Senator Sherman proposing numerous changes in the laws regulating the election of congressmen. It provides that after May 1, 1890, elections for representatives in congress shall be conducted according to the provisions of the bill and the legislatures of the states may direct the election of presidential electors in the same manner, the expense of the election in such cases to be paid out of the federal treasury.

The senate further considered the tariff bill. Cotton bagging formed the main topic of discussion.

HOUSE.—The deadlock in the house was broken to-day by the recommittal of the resolution to change the rules. The vote stood: Yeas, 120; nays, 117. The following republicans voted in the affirmative: Anderson of Iowa, Anderson of Kansas, Baker of Illinois, Cheadle, Finley, Fuller, Gest, Lehlbach, and Turner of Kansas, and the following Democrats in the negative: French, Hayes, Hopkins of Virginia, Outhwaite, Springer, Tarsney, Townshend and Weaver.

The committee on Indian affairs of the house met and agreed to put the Gifford Sioux bill among its measures to be called up for consideration on the committees day on the 10th inst.

Wednesday, Jan. 9.

SENATE.—In the senate the house amendments to the Nicaragua canal bill were nonconcurred in and Senators Sherman, Edmunds and Morgan were appointed conferees. The senate then resumed consideration of the tariff bill.

HOUSE.—The house spent the day in filibustering. At the conclusion of the chaplain's prayer, Mr. Weaver of Iowa called the speaker's attention to the rule directing the reading of the journal "upon the appearance of a quorum." He raised the point that the journal could not be read until it was apparent that a quorum was in attendance. A roll call was ordered. At its conclusion Mr. Weaver introduced dilatory motions until 3:10, when he permitted the reading of the journal. At the conclusion of the reading, Mr. Springer of Illinois asked an order for a final vote on the Oklahoma bill at 4 o'clock Jan. 14. Mr. Outhwaite of Ohio offered an amendment providing that a final vote, on the Union Pacific funding bill be taken Jan. 23, but his amendment was declared out of order. Mr. Brumm of Pennsylvania, objected to granting Mr. Springer's request, and objections was also made to his request that the matter be referred to the committee on rules. After further filibustering, the house, at 3:30 adjourned.

Thursday, Janurry. 10.

SENATE.—The members of the senate sub committee having charge of the tariff bill have been in conference for some time with the senators from the lumber states in the Northwest on the proposed reduction in the duty on lumber.

HOUSE.—With each day wasted by the house in filibustering, the talk of an extra session increases, and unless some means is soon discoverd to break the deadlock that now exists, an extra session of the house is regarded as highly probably. Mr. McKinley said today that the house would certainly take up the senate tariff bill when it came from the senate, and unless that bill could be thoroughly discussed and passed, an extra session would follow. The loss of time will throw the appropriation bills into the time which by general consent is now set apart for tariff discussion in the house on the senate substitute. Some members to-day expressed the opinion that heroic means should be resorted to break the deadlock, and one member of upwards of twenty years' service in the house thought that a resolution to expel the members who were abusing the rules of the house with their obstructive motions would be justified by the country in the circumstances.

Friday Jan. 11.

SENATE.—Consideration of the tariff bill was resumed in the senate, the pending question being Mr. Plumb's amendment to put all fresh fish on the free list, which was rejected and fresh fish will have to pay a duty of half a cent a pound.

HOUSE.—The house spent most of the day in filibustering. A strong effort was made to transact business, but Mr. Weaver continued to interpose dilatory motions. The house finally took a recess till 8 p. m., the evening session to be for the consideration of private pension bills. Mr. Weaver was not present at the evening session, but his work was done by Mr. Kilgore of Texas, who filibustered so effectually that the house did no business whatever.

Saturday, Jan. 12.

SENATE.—In the Senate consideration of the tariff bill was resumed, and some important amendments were adopted. When the tariff bill was taken up at the conclusion of the morning hour, Mr. Morgan sent to the clerk's desk a proposed amendment which he said he would offer at the proper time.

"All laws and parts of laws which exempt from the payment of duties any article of commerce upon which duties are imposed in this act when in transit through the United States to or from the Dominion of Canada, or any province thereof, are hereby declared inoperative."

Mr. Gray offered an amendment to add to the paragraph permitting the importation free of duty of "lumber, timber, etc., necessary to the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States for foreign account and ownership or employment in foreign trade," plates, deck-beams, forgings, composition-metal in all structural shapes, including machinery and parts of machinery.

HOUSE.—A temporary truce was declared between the friends and enemies of the Oklahoma bill today and the house proceeded with its regular business. Two appropriation bills were passed and several other important measures acted upon.

Mr. Randall gave notice that he would call up the Small-Elliott election case the following day. The consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill was proceeded with.

The third official trip of the United States dynamite gun cruiser Vesuvius was made over the new course of the Delaware breakwater. The trial was the most successful of the three, the vessel attaining a rate of twenty-one knots per hour, while the contract calls but for twenty knots. Lieut. Cowles telegraphed Secretary Whitney as follows: "Success; 21.64 knots."

Lewis McMullen, appraiser at New York, was requested to resign, but refused to do so. The president has therefore directed his removal from off—

MINNESOTA IN BRIEF.

The number of coal dock laborers out on a strike at Duluth is 500.

The city schools at Austin enrolled 800 pupils during the past term.

A special from Duluth says there is considerable trouble in the high school in that city. Some of the classes have refused to recite to the principal, G. H. R. Plum.

The Madelia specialty company, with a capital stock of $10,000 has incorporated. Its object is to manufacture coffee pots and its principal place of business is Madelia.

The railroad company has built a sixteen-stall round house, making Montevideo division headquarters. This brings several hundred inhabitants, to that town.

Albert Shaw, while chopping wood opposite Reed's Landing was instantly killed by the falling of a tree that had lodged. Deceased leaves a wife and three small children.

During the year 1888 there were employed in the manufacturing industries of Red Wing 1,049 men, received $461,500 in wages. The value of the manufactured product was $1,611,000.

The women of Malta gave to the Queen for a jubilee present a skirt or train of the finest Maltese lace, eighteen feet long with a profuse flouncing and trimming. The Queen is much pleased with it and will wear it at her first drawing room next season.

David Irvin, an old and well-known resident of the town of Milton, Waseca county, died and was buried a few days ago. He had reached the age of 115 years and had a distinct recollection of events succeeding the revolution. He had met and talked with George Washington and other statesmen of his time, and was a soldier of the war of 1812.

The fifth victim of diphtheria, a son of Joseph Diedrich, of the American hotel, died at Little Falls, and several others in various parts of the city are in a dangerous condition. Ample warning has been given to citizens to take measures to prevent the spread of the disease, yet unpardonable carelessness exists among the people.

Bernard Bjornoos, a single man aged twenty-five years, living alone in Aurdal township, Otter Tail county started to visit a friend Christmas night and has not been seen since. A searching party went out and found things in the bottom of Turtle lake which he was known to have had with him, which convinces them that he was drowned in crossing the lake.

Frank Samuelson, a farmer living in Vasa township, Goodhue county, committed suicide by hanging himself in an outhouse with a piece of binding twine. He was found shortly after by his wife, but life was extinct. He had been slightly unsound in mind for some time previous. He leaves a wife and eight children. He was fifty-eight years of age.

The Southern Minnesota Horticultural society elected officers for the ensuing year as follows: President A. W. Sias, Rochester; vice presidents, John T. Hawes, La Crescent, and M. Hong, Rochester; secretary and treasurer, Wayland Stedman, Rochester; delegate to the state horticultural society, Wayland Stedman, Rochester. An effort will be made to secure an appropriation from the legislature of $240 for the district societies in the state; which will act as feeders in the state society. The meeting adjourned to meet in Rochester in July.

Some days ago Varnum Blood was arrested on a charge of stealing and was bound over to appear before the grand jury at Vendale. George Broadway was about to sign his bond when his brother Lon interfered and would not allow him to do so. Next evening Lon Broadway and Blood met at the saloon, and with the assistance of a little booze soon worked up a fight. Broadway struck Blood a couple of times with steel knuckles, cutting his head terribly, when the latter, who is a large, powerful man, seized Broadway and dashed him on the floor and was about to pulverize him when the bystanders interfered. No arrests have been made. Blood's head was bound up and he was hauled home.

Factors in Colds.

In every case there are two factors, an irritant and a susceptibility of the system. Among the irritants are microscopic germs taken in without, as in influenza, and certain poisons which are developed from nutrition or imperfect assimilation within the body, and which it is the office of the liver to destroy. Indeed, the effects of the two causes are essentially the same, for the germs act by generating certain violent poisons, which irritate the mucous membrane of the nostrils, pharynx, lungs, stomach or bowels.—Youth's Companion

Cocoa and Chocolate.

Cocoa and chocolate are both delicious and nourishing drinks which the average housekeeper rarely makes well. The trouble in many cases is that there are not enough of the material used, and it simply makes the milk taste sickly. Chocolate requires more care in making, and is rather more expensive than cocoa. It is really no trouble to make the latter, as put up by a well-known English firm, and it is an excellent thing for the children's breakfast during the winter. It must also be most highly recommended to nursing mothers, providing additional nutriment for the extra strain on the system. And impotant to lean and angular girls, it is a great thing for rounding out curves and giving a generous covering of flesh.

The "Old Baby's" Grief.

What a curious thing it is to think that that wonderful new baby will turn into a common-place old baby in a year or two—that with the advent of number two his reign is over.

A little girl, though she is only two years old, takes an interest in that new baby, feels that she must help take care of it, goes about maternally airing its garments and holding the pin cushion for nurse, delights in its baths, and boasts about her baby brother before she can talk plain. But the boy—that is another matter. He scowls when that wrinkled piece of humanity is presented to him and he refuses to kiss it. He wants none of it. Why should it have his place on mamma's shoulder? Why should he be told to go away? He thinks as ill of it as his limited knowledge of mundane affairs will permit him to think of anything. He has been known to request that it might be "frowed away," and to call it "nassy sing," and indeed, his trials are very great. Life has altered signally for him. He feels it to his heart's core, if he is made of sensitive stuff.

It is all very well for Bridget to take him into the kitchen and tell him to "be a nice lad an' she'll make him a cake." He wants his mother. He was never turned out of mother's room before. His heart is full. Well for him at this time if he has a grandmother ready to make him her idol, a little jealous for him as the first born. Then, indeed, his ways shortly become the ways of pleasantness, and life assumes a holiday, cake, candy, gingerbread and toy aspect. But in any event that old baby has a very unhappy day or two before it, a season when knowledge of the bitterness of life comes to him prematurely, and he understands the feelings of a deposed emperor.

Bed and Board.

Table-mats are again in fashion, and this is sensible, as they protect the table-cloth. Crocheted mats are the most useful, easily washed and durable. Hemstitching on both table and bed linen is universal. With the former the housekeeper can choose between plain hemstitching, drawn work, and fringed borders. Tray cloths, napkins and square and centerpieces for the table are finished to match the cloth. Some linen sheets are hemstitched at both ends, and the pillow and bolster cases match them. An upper sheet for the guest chamber, besides hemstitching at the end which is to fold over, has open work and fine embroidery extending nearly half a yard from the hem. The shams are done in the same pattern. A bolster sham is less trouble than the embroidered sheet, as it can be easily removed when the bed is about to be occupied. When the same pillows are to be used, plain cases are first put on, and the embroidered ones are taken off for the night.

Just a Trifle Forgetful.

From the Brunswick Breeze.

Elliot Dunn gave the Breeze the details of quite an amusing incident that happened on board the train while on his way to Atlanta.

Shortly after the train pulled out of Brunswick he noticed a Savanah man on board with an unusually happy smile on his face.

The man seemed wrapped in silent meditation on some pleasing subject, as he would occasionally chuckle to himself, and Mr. Dunn was quite amused at watching him.

Presently, much to the surprise of Mr. Dunn, he sprang suddenly to his feet with the exclamation: "Great Scott! I've forgotten to get a health certificate and won't be admitted into Savannah without it."

The conductor coming through, the man explained his dilemma to him, and the urbane official introduced him to Mr. Dunn, who regretted his inability to furnish him with the desired certificate as he had neither blanks nor pen and ink.

"But my dear sir," said the Savannah man, "I'm on my way to get married, and if I'm detained I shall be ruined."

"If you get me pen and ink I'll write you a certificate," said Mr. Dunn.

The conductor said there was none on board, and that it would be impossible to detain the train until it could be obtained at Jesup.

"But, My dear girl, the preacher and the guests will all be waiting and wondering why I do not put in an appearance," said the man.

"Telegraph her," suggested Mr. Dunn.

"I can't! She lives some miles from Savannah, where there is no telegraph station," he replied.

Finnally Mr. Dunn gave him his own certificate and told him to see if he could pass on it.

This morning Mr. Dunn received a letter stating that the certificate had passed him all right, and after getting married he had added the words "and wife" to it, so that read, "Elliot Dunn and wife," under which alias the happy couple had gone on their bridal tour.

The Hot-Water Cure.

Hot water is by all means a preferable drink for some persons suffering from dyspepsia, gastric catarrh, inflamed stomach, etc. And this is the condition represented by the great mass of invalids who have stomach derangements. Hot water is soothing to the mucous membrane. It cleanses it also, and promotes activity of the secreting vessels. Its influence upon the stomach is not, however, more beneficial than upon the general system. The stomach is the great organ of sympathy, and whenever it is warmed the whole body sympathizes, and so by warming the stomach we promote circulation and nutrition, and the development of power. Cold water is contraindicated in all cases of invalidism, unless it be in acute fevers. In saying this we do not prohibit its use, but only give preference to warm water wherever there is a debilitated condition of the stomach without real fever. Invalids should be guided, however, somewhat by their sensations. If the use of cold water warms and comforts them, there is no reason why it may not be used moderately. Iced water is always injurious and frequently dangerous. But drinking at or soon after meals either of hot or cold water is bad practice. We should do our drinking sometime before eating; but after digestion has begun, abstinence from drinks should be maintained for three or four hours. If patients will refrain from free use of common salt, water-drinking will not be so necessary, and water is the only proper drink. Whoever would have good health would do well to avoid all other forms of beverage. Milk is food, not drink, and may be eaten with other food, but should never be drunk.—The Laws of Health.

A Man Whom Handcuffs Cannot Hold.

A young man named Miller stepped into the cafe of the Casino New York, and engaged in conversation with Detective Heidelberg. During the chat he incidentally remarked that he had yet to find the pair of handcuffs which could hold him. In an instant Heidelberger exhibited the pair he used recently while playing gendarme in Belgium. They were formidable-looking objects, and, once placed on a man's wrists, could hold him securely, whether he had his hands before or behind his back. Miller put his hands behind his back, the handcuffs were drawn tight, and the detective demanded an illustration. Even while he was talking Miller exposed his wrists, free of the irons. Heidelberg was amazed but not convinced. Miller then crossed his wrists in front and the "derbys" were fastened so tightly that it seemed as though they would cut through the skin. Slowly the flesh seemed to shrivel and then quick as a flash the braclets were removed. The wonder then explained that when he is ready to have the irons placed he clinches his hands and the wrists expand.—New York Sun.

At The South Pole.

It appears to be probable that Prof. Neumayr of Hamburg Marine observatory will succeed in getting a south polar expedition organized. It might have been supposed that until some greater measure of success had attended similar adventures in the artic regions the most ardent advocate of such schemes would have doubted the wisdom of exposing human lives and treasure to the risk of antarctic seas All the best authorities are agreed, says the London Daily News, that the difficulties to be encountered in the south are much greater than in the north, and the hideous stories which gained currency after the return of the last artic expedition might well have sickened the boldest of this generation sufficiently to deter them from any assault upon the stronghold of king winter in the south. In comparing the difficulties of arctic and antarctic adventure, Sir Wyville Thompson says:

"We can only anticipate disasters, multiplied a hundred-fold, should the south pole ever become a goal of rivalry among nations." For various reasons the great lone land under the southern cross is more difficult of access than the north. It is much colder there than in the arctic circle. There seems to be no such warm currents as are found in the north—such, for instance, as the Labrador current, or that round the south coast of Spitzbergen. Such emanations from the torrid regions of the earth do much to mitigate the rigors of the northern seas at certain points, and bring about the most striking variations of temperature, breaking up the ice at certain seasons and opening the way to navigation far beyond points otherwise attainable. Any enterprise of this kind will, of course, be pushed on during the summer months—during January, February, and the early part of March, that is. But even in the height of summer the temperature of the air in the antarctic regions is always below the freezing point of sea water, and bitter tempestuous winds and fogs and blinding snowstorms are all but incessant. No arctic explorer has ever gone beyond the bounds of vegetation. At least lichens and seaweed have been found wherever northern navigators have penetrated but in the awful solitudes of the south Sir James Ross found not the slightest trace of vegetable life, either on land or in the sea, yet he never came within less than 700 miles of the south pole. The magnetic pole has been approached within 150 miles, and it seems possible that important scientific results might be obtained by covering that farther distance but even this is doubtful.

A Model Kitchen.

From the Scientific American.

It is possible nowadays, says an authority, by spending money lavishly, so to build a kitchen that the most ingenious of servants cannot keep it otherwise than clean. One need not waste upon her unappreciative soul the costly tiles with which one lines the bath room, but may substitute for them the glazed bricks that are as highly polished and that will make the floor, the chimney, the walls, if desired, and even the ceiling as easy to clean as a breakfast plate. Once built, no white washer and no painter would be needed for such a room, no smoke need cling to its walls for an instant, and no odor of cooking would be perceptible in it, even if it were used for generations. And the temperature of such a room need not reach the great height unavoidable with plastered walls, which permit the warmth of the chimney to be perceptible through their surface, and thus both the good health and good temper of the cook would be maintained. As for coloring, such a kitchen may be precisely what one pleases, for the bricks are made in all hues, and they may be laid in patterns or in wide surfaces of one tint from floor to ceiling. Lastly, as such a room would be fireproof, a sliding or swinging iron door would so isolate it that no kerosene-quickened fire and no careless upsetting of lard could bring destruction to the room itself of which a little water would not clear it.

Too Much of a Good Thing.

The new minister came to ——ville last autumn to take charge of the largest and most prosperous congregation in the place. As we know, it is of prime importance that the shepherd should know his flock, and as a means to this end he was successively invited out to tea by the different families in his congregation. For many months after his arrival he was not know to take tea in his own house. Each housekeeper was anxious to do her best. The old family china and glass were taken down from the top shelf, silver that was used on great occasions was brought out, and an inviting menu prepared. The first hostess had tea and coffee, hot rolls, cold ham, a dish of scalloped oysters, cake and sherbet. The second evening there was beaten biscuit, chicken salad, scalloped oysters and charlotte russe. The third evening the principal dish was again scalloped oysters. They appeared the next night, and the next, and for forty nights the new minister ate scalloped oysters with his parishioners. Whether he concluded that these were a peculiar people, with whom the serving of scalloped oysters was an essential part of the rite of hospitality, or whether his views of a forty day's fast or the forty years in the wilderness were modified by the ordeal through which he was called to pass, we do not know; but the end had not come even then. On the forty-first evening a new dish finished the piece de resistance, but at the forty-second tea there again appeared the scalloped oysters. If you wish now to make an unfortunate remark to the Rev. Mr. Blank, just ask him how he likes oysters prepared.

The oldest medicine in the world is probably Dr. Isaac Thompson's CELEBRATED EYE WATER. It is a carefully prepared physician's prescription, and has been in use for NEARLY A CENTURY. For all external inflamation of the eyes it is an infallible remedy, and is unequalled in removing inflamation of the eyes, at the commencement, and in curing chronic cases. We invite the attention of physicians to its merits. For sale by all Druggists.

My Poor Back!

That "poor back" is held responsible for more than its share of the sufferings of mankind. If your dog bites a man who kicks it, do you blame the dog? On the same principle the kidneys utter their protest against nervousness, impure blood, and resulting constipation. These force them to do extraordinary work in ridding the system of the poisons which are the result of effete matter retained in the blood. Then the sufferer says the back aches; the kidneys are diseased. "Not yet;" but they will be unless the nerves are strengthened, the blood purified, and the constipation removed. These are the causes of kidney troubles, and Paine's Celery Compound removes them quickly. With its tonic, purifying, and laxative effect, it also strengthens the weak kidneys, making it almost infallible in curing all diseases of the nerves and kidneys. If your hopes of cure have not been realized, try Paine's Celery Compound; it gives perfect health to all who complain of "their poor backs." Price $1.00.

KISSES OF GOLD.

A French Fairy Story.

She sang the songs of forest birds—but never bird sang them so sweetly!

He played the tambourine of the Bohemian dance, but never Gypsy fingers glanced so lightly or shook such music from silver bells!

And together they wandered through the land.

Who were they?

They knew not! But those who were sheltered in houses from wind and storm, those who were served on white linen and in plenty, were not of their kin.

And did they remember nothing?

Remember? Ah, yes. A day when the skies frowned and the cold rain fell; when the leaves in the forest shuddered and the wind screamed harshly:—

"Go on! go on!"

"Far away, down the mountain, the sun is shining," he said, and he took her hand and led her to where the sands of the coast were golden and the waters were blue and bright. And from that time they had traveled always toward the sun. Assuredly, they might have perished of of thirst and hunger! But did not the good God make the stream run in the forest? and the village housewife could always find a crust too hard to throw to her chickens! When the nights were cold he took off his bit of a ragged coat and threw it about her shoulders and clasped her close in her arms. When the sun burned fiercely he bade her rest in the shade of the forest while he went through the village streets and played and sang for both. She had only rags to cover her, but through them shone a skin like satin, and Milady would barter her best silken gown for such a pair of shoulders.

Wandering, wandering! Sometimes a day, sometimes an hour in the village; sometimes welcomed, sometimes chased; sometimes heard and even applauded—for they were fair to see and pleasant to hear—sometimes driven from the door with imprecations by those who hated them at once for their youth, their beauty, and their poverty—sometimes with a handful of sous—sometimes, ah yes, very often empty-handed!

But though there were those who would not give, there were none who might take away. And they had always their great love. No misery can be so cold and cruel as love is warm and sweet.

But there came long winter days, when doors were closed, and hearts were closed with them. There came long winter nights, when they had need of all their love and all their childish courage. The woods and roads were one whirling mass of stinging snow. Food, shelter, both were denied them. They could go forward but slowly against the rough hands of the wind, and for many hours they struggled, until at last fainting, falling, they reached a ruined granary, whose tottering walls should at least offer some poor defense against the icy breath of the storm.

As if enraged at the loss of his prey, the wind howled hideously without and threatened to drag their shelter from over them; chilling gusts swept through a hundred rents in the roof; the snow drifted in about them as they lay on the floor. He threw his arms about her—cold, shaking arms.

"I will warm thee!" he said, but his voise sounded far away, and his teeth chattered so that he understood not his words, only the caress which accompanied them. She crept closer to his breast. She placed her lips to his ear, he could not feel their touch, but he heard her voice.

"And to-morrow?"

He said nothing. What could he say? That there would be no to-for them? or that to-morrow would find them dead—here on these stones—cold, hard—but neither so cold nor so hard—as the hearts of men!

A tear fell on his cheek.

"Cry not!" he said, and with shaking lips he kissed her.

A faint light seemed about them. A carressing warmth enveloped them. A sound as of music, faint, and sweet, came to them, and a voice spoke:

"Poor little ones! Abandoned! forsaken!"

Mute, awe-stricken, yet not afraid, they gazed into the fast-increaing light, which, though on every side of them, showed them neither their own faces nor yet any part of their miserable surroundings—only the beautiful, radiant eyes of a woman bending over them. The soothing voice went on in rhythmic cadence:

"Poor little ones! And are ye cold, and have ye hunger, and do ye thirst? Listen, then, to the promise of One who can fulfill all desires! A price there is to pay— but that ye shall know—of yourselves—after. Now will I give ye power to rain gold from your lips whensoe'er they shall open. Say—quickly—say! will ye pay the price—even though ye know not what it may be?"

He hesitated an instant! She—not at all!

"Yes!" she cried breathlessly, "yes!"

"Yes!" he repeated after her, "yes!"

Suddenly, as it had appeared, the light vanished. In its place came the gray dawn, creeping through the torn and quivering rafters.

"It was a dream!" she breathed softly—as if fearful of waking; but however softly she spoke, her lips parted that the words might pass, and with them came a flood of gold—ducats, sovereigns, florins, sequins, doubloons! Down over her breast and upon the rags which covered her graceful limbs, they lay, in dazzling piles, in glittering heaps! And again and again, as she said, "Ah! how beautiful! how beautiful!" they rained about her—a golden shower! Yes, a beautiful golden shower.

About this time the world rang with the fame of a certain young Grand Duke and his Duchess—scarce more than children—who lived in a wonderful palace as big as a city, as brilliant as the sky with its countless stars. Its walls were of costly marbles, incrusted with amethyst and chrysoprase; its galleries were wrought of silver and of gold; its tapestries, its statuary, its paintings, its marvelous furniture entransed the eye and silenced the lips! Grand feasts were here given, daily, where all the world might enjoy. Tables of porphyry and malachite shook beneath their loads of danties served in golden dishes, and rare wines flowed from crystal flagons into gold-set cups, each cut from a single precious stone. And the Grand Duke and his beautiful young Duchess who presided at these feasts were never known to open their lips, either to eat or to speak, but a flood of gold poured forth, to be speedily gathered up by the servitors, tossed into baskets of silver filagree, and distributed among the enraptured guests. Naturally these magnificent entertainments were always largely attended, and yet there was invariably place and gold for more. So much was said of Milord the Duke and Milady the Duchess that the story of their splendor and generosity traveled as far as Fairy Land. The beautiful Queen of the Fairies smiled a strange smile.

"The time has come when I must pay a visit to my friends the Duke and his Duchess," she said. "I would like well to hear their expressions of gratitude!" And still smiling that strange smile, she went on her way.

Night held the world in her arms! The magnificent castle was wrapped in silence and darkness. Only from the bouboir of the Duchess came a sound of suppressed weeping, and from the chamber of the Duke issued the heavy sighs of one in sorrow. Hastily the Queen summoned them before her.

"How now!" she exclaimed sternly, a frown darkening her radiant brow. "Have I given ye all these riches that ye might build a palace—fare like nobles, and attire yourselves in the splendor of jewels—and as yet asked of ye no price, and are ye still unsatisfied?"

"Ah, Madame!" cried Milady piteously. "Thou knowest naught of the price we pay!"

But the Fairy interrupting her, spoke again—"If ye have tired of the gold which issues from your lips, I will promise that henceforth shall fall rubies diamonds, pearls, sapphires." But the young Duke flung himself at her feet.

"Ah no!" he implored. "Out of thy bounty and goodness—no!" And even as he spoke there gushed from his lips a cascade of glittering gems! Shrinking from them as they lay in their beauty about him, he crept yet nearer her feet, and raising a bit of her garment to his lips, went on tremulously: "Winter nights are cold—the hearts of men are often colder—and the wind blows chill on the heads of the poor! But though thou gavest me instead of this, fire and shelter, and friends and warmth, yet is no warmth like the touch of Love's hand, and this hast thou taken away! The starved body cries out for food. But though thou hast given food in plenty, and choice and rare, yet is there no hunger like that of the heart famished for the love it has known and lost. Poverty hath many a sting and smart, and in its misery longs for all that gold can bring. Yet the gold and the gems which fall at my will can purchase me not one kiss of love, and there is no want so bitter as the thirst, unsatisfied for love's caress! Oh, Fairy! If such thou art, take back thy gifts, for I have learned their price!"

"The Fairy laid her hand on the heads bowed before her. Into her eyes came a softer light.

"My children," she said gently, "If I give ye now your heart's desire, there is, then, this other price to pay! Your castle, your riches, your friends. all—all must ye renounce! There is no middle path along this way ye have chosen! With the bitter comes the sweet—with the sweet—the bitter! And have ye chosen so?"

* * * * * * *

The wind shrieked around the ruined granary and the storm beat its fierce hands against the shuddering walls. The snow crept in through countless crevices and lay thick on the rags which covered, but scarce could warm, two shivering figures crouching on the stone floor. The boy held the girl to his heart; she laid her lips lovingly on his.

They were cold—they were hungry—they were poor—they were alone! But in their hearts was a great gladness because they were all of these for Love's dear sake.

Piercing Children's Ears.

"You would be surprised if you could see the number of mothers who come to have the ears of their female infants pierced," said a Gratiot avenue jeweller, as he pinched the soft, pink lobe attached to the head of a good looking young woman. "I cannot understand why a mother should want her three or four-year-old babe subjected to such a practice, which is of itself barbarous, but it is no use refusing them, so I perforated their auricular organs for 25 cents a pair. The age of sixteen is as early as a girl should wear ornaments.

"Is the operation painful? To grown persons, yes. But in cases of infants, by rolling the lobe upon the ball of my thumb with my index finger I drive all the blood to the top of the ear and reduce the pain to a minimum. I notice one peculiarity that I cannot explain, and that is that in piercing the right ear the subject always experiences more or less pain, while the puncturing of the left ear is attended by little, if any, painful effects."

The Sultan and Missionaires.

New York World.

The Sultan of Zanzibar is a most irratic individual. A short time ago the world was shocked by his cruel decrees regarding the punishment of criminals, and now he has presented certain German missionaries with land for the erection of a church and hospital. Perhaps he wants to fatten the missionaries.

SPARKLE'S SKELETON.

Dr. Philalethes Sparkle was a great man in a small way. He was the vicar of an important suburban church, wherein a highly respectable and not wholly unintelligent congregation was wont to assemble for worship. In that congregation the pastor had no enemies, while he could boast of a large number of thorough-going and ardent admirers. The man was admittedly well fitted for his post. He was kind-hearted, liberal-minded, quick-witted, a fluent speaker, and, in the opinion of many, a thoughtful as well as eloquent preacher. But, in truth, "thoughtful" was just what Dr. Sparkle was not. His great difficulty, and one that increased weekly, was about ideas. When he knew what to say, he could say it well. No man could produce a more "brilliant corruscation" or effective flare-up from a paltry amount of material; but then, the fuel had to come from somewhere, and that was the doctors difficulty. He had a reputation to maintain, and he was fully, almost painfully, conscious of the fact.

Under these circumstances, and being sorely harassed by the recurrent drying up of the well-spring of his ideas, Dr. Sparkle had his attention arrested one morning by an artfully worded circular which was found among his letters. It began as follows:

STRICTLY PRIVATE.—Ad Clerum.

Moved by the spirit of sympathy, and actuated, as he humbly hopes, by a desire to promote the highest ends, the writer addresses himself to his over-wrought and sorely oppressed brethern. Having had an exceptionally wide experience of parish work in town and country, among rich and poor, educated and ignorant, he believes himself to be fully conversant with the tastes and requirements of each separate class in the community. No one better than the present writer knows what it is to have to prepare—amid a multitude of other vocations—two, three, or more sermons a week. He has suffered himself, and can, therefore, feel for his brethern who are suffering. Accordingly he is anxious at the lowest price that will cover actual outlay, to impart to his brethern the results of a system of sermon production which has been perfected by himself after years of anious toil and profound study.

Dr. Sparkle smiled as he read the bombastic document, and was about to throw it into the waste basket, when something stayed his hand.

"I wonder whether many clergymen avail themselves of this sort of thing, my dear?" he said, tossing the circular to his faithful wife, who generally sat with him for an hour of a morning. "To deliberately get up and read another man's sermon seems to me absolutely sinful."

"But all men are not gifted like you, Lethe, dear; and I suppose there are some who find it very difficult to preach a good sermon," suggested Mrs. Sparkle.

"It is the dishonesty of the thing that shocks me," explained the doctor. "If a man can't write a sermon, or hasn't time, let him honestly say so. Let him take a printed book and read from it; but to go into the pulpit with a lithograph and deliver it as his own, is a thing I can't conceive any christian man daring to do."

Some time after this, the vicar found it necessary to appoint a new curate, the old one having married a rich wife and forthwith kicked over the traces. Among several applicants, the doctor's favorite was the Rev. Jonathan Cribber. But as it was necessary, in appearance at least, to consult the wishes of the congregation (who were expected to find the funds), it was arranged that, before arriving at the decision, the young man should be invited to preach on a certain Sunday evening.

When the day arrived on which Mr. Cribber was "to try his voice," Dr. Sparkle was suffering from a bad cold. In the morning, being single-handed, he had no choice but to get through the service as well as he could; and, being a man who, when put to it, was always equal to the occasion, he acquitted himself very creditably. He delivered a striking and pathetic address from the words, "the foolishness of preaching," and the physical disability under which he was evidently laboring, only served to highten the effect of his elusions to the "earthen vessels," to which celestial treasures were so often entrusted. But in the evening, obedient to his doctor's orders, the good man stayed at home.

As the night drew on Dr. Sparkle became very much depressed, despite all his wife's efforts to cheer him.

"I am sure you would have been pleased, dear, if you could have heard the way the people spoke of you when coming out of church this morning. The Grundys had some friends with them, and they said they had never heard a better sermon."

"And you, my dear—what did you think of it?"

"I think it was the most beautiful sermon you ever preached." replied the lady enthusiastically, "though all your sermons have been splendid of late. Some months ago, you remember, you complained of feeling exhausted, and insisted that the fountain of your ideas was drying up. But it seems to me that ever since your ideas have been brighter and more original than formerly; they have bubbled and sparkled as though to match your name,"

"I feel exhausted and utterly dried up to-night, anyhow. I'm fit for nothing."

"You have studied too hard, Lethe, dear. Your brain has been overwrought," said Mrs. Sparkle, affectionately. "We must go for a nice long holiday when the new curate comes. Only last week Dr. Briggs said that if ever a man had earned a holiday you had."

On Monday morning the vicar was so far recovered that he was able to receive Mr. Grundy in his study. The worthy churchwarden was evidently ill at ease. His inquiries as to the pastor's health were profused and long-drawn out; his observations on the weather diffusive and inconsistent. At length Dr. Sparkle found it necessary to bring him to the point.

"Well, Mr. Grundy I am waiting to hear how everything went off last night."

"Oh, first-rate, sir, first-rate. Large congregation, beautiful anthem, offertory above the average."

"And Mr. Cribber?"

"A most excellent young man, as I believe, sir. Fine voice, made a good impression—that is on those who hadn't heard you in the morning."

The vicar smiled, and looked well pleased at what he deemed to be a neat compliment intended for himself.

"Well, my friend, you must remember he is but a young man and without much experience. We ought not to be too critical. We all had to make a beginning once."

"It isn't that, sir. It was the coincidence that struck the people."

"The what?" exclaimed Dr. Sparkle, a vague sense of uneasiness creeping over him.

"The coincidence, sir. He gave us 'The foolishness of preaching' over again. I mean his text was the same as that which you so ably expounded in the morning."

"Rather awkward," laughed the vicar. "I fear it would have embarrassed the poor young fellow had he known about it; but, after all, the thing might easily happen. The words are in the evening lesson, though I took them for my text in the morning. You see, the arrangement for Mr. Cribber to preach was somewhat hurriedly made."

"But it isn't only the text—it is the sermon itself the people are talking about, sir. I didn't pay much attention myself but Mrs. Grundy will have it that, though the words were different, the substance, the backbone, the skeleton was just the same."

"The skeleton!" exclaimed the vicar, in a horror stricken voice.

"Well that's the word my wife used," said the church warden, apologetically. "I didn't quite follow her myself; for, though I've heard of people having skeletons in a cupboard, I never knew of one in a pulpit." Mr. Grundy laughed at his own smartness, but a dark cloud settled upon the broad brow of Dr. Sparkle.

Poor Dr. Sparkle was in a terrible fix. There was Grundy waiting to be gulled, and it was incumbent on him to say something. He gave a little sigh, and spoke in his softest accents:

"Well, you see, Mr. Grundy, not having heard this wonderful sermon, I cannot discuss the matter in detail; nor would I wish to think anything to the disparagement of a young man who has been very highly recommended to me. Several partial solutions occur to me, none of them reflecting unduly on Mr. Cribber. Possibly, we may have looked into the same commentary—"

Mr. Grundy gave a knowing nod.

"Possibly Mr. Cribber may have read some article of mine in one or other of the religious periodicals treating of this subject. I say possibly, though I do not at this moment recall having written anything about it."

Mr. Grundy gave another yet more knowing nod.

"And there is yet another hypothesis connected with the obscure topic of unconsciousness cerebration and reminiscence. I tell you candidly I have preached on that text before—at the abbey once, and elsewhere perhaps. Mr. Cribber may have heard me. My thoughts may have passed into an impressionable mind. There have been most remarkable instances of this phenomenon."

Mr. Grundy was evidently impressed.

"I think," he said, "I can understand how it happened now, and the explanation you have given is very interesting. But, perhaps, under the circumstances, you might find some more suitable gentleman for the curacy."

"I almost think you are right, Grundy," assented the vicar, eagerly. "Mr. Cribber seems scarcely up to the mark for such a congregation as ours. There were several other applicants who were most highly recommended—Mr. Playfair, for instance."

Dr. Sparkle spoke in his most dulcet tone, but as soon as Mr. Grundy left the room he sat down and wrote as follows to the Rev. Jonathan:

DEAR SIR: From what I hear of the sermon delived by you last night, I regret that I am obliged to conclude that you are altogether unsuited to my curacy. My people have been accustomed to original, or at all events independent, thought in the pulpit; and I do not suppose you would yourself maintain the applicability of either of these words to the discourse with which you favored them. I return the testimonials you sent me, and beg to remain, yours faithfully, P. SPARKLE.

Having sent this ill-tempered production to the post, the unfortunate man was forthwith ashamed of himself, and would gladly have recalled it. He blamed himself for all that had happened, and became a victim to horrible remorse and abject fear. His wife had her own suspicions, but kept them to herself.

That very afternoon the Rev. Jonathan Cribber, in hot indignation, sought out the clerical agent who had made up for his own lack of brains and energy, and bearded him to his den.

"I can only say," replied the suave cleric who devoted his energies to helping his weaker brethern, "that for originality of thought and freshness of treatment, I consider 'the foolishness of preaching' to be among my masterpieces. I could show you numerous letters that I have received in reference to that very sermon. There must, I take it, be something very unfortunate in your voice or mode of delivery. Now, I am about to form a clerical elocution class, and I would strongly urge upon you—"

"My voice is excellent, sir! I have been congratulated upon it time and again!" roared the Reverend Jonathan.

"I do not doubt its power, sir," replied the agent, with a deprecatory motion of his hand; but it may need —"

"You talk about letters, sir. Read that!" said the irate Cribber, interrupting him, and flinging Dr. Sparkle's note upon the table.

The agent read the letter, and then, after a few minutes' consideration, he remarked:

"Do you mean to say that you gave them 'The folishness of preaching' in Dr. Sparkle's church?"

"I do; and why not? I paid you for the sermon."

"You told me you were in Lincoln diocese when I sent it to you."

"And so I was; but I came to town to see after Dr. Sparkle's curacy. I had a perfect right to preach the sermon," said the Rev. Jonathan, fiercely.

"Yes, I suppose you had—at your own risk," admitted the agent.

"But it has lost me an excellent curacy," continued the irate Cribber.

"And you have lost me an excellent client. Good morning."

* * * * * * *

On the following Sunday Dr. Sparkle's pulpit was occupied by Mr. Playfair, and it was announced that the vicar, in obedience to the peremptory orders of his medical adviser, had gone abroad for a few weeks.

The doctor is now, with his faithful wife by his side, recruiting his energies and laying in a genuine stock of fresh ideas. He has resolved for the future to have no secrets from Mrs. Sparkle, and to eschew "skeletons."—London Truth.

How She Won Him.

"How She Won Him," might well be the title of a little romance of New York City. The heroine is a young lady, formerly wealthy, but who in reduced circumstances, met and loved the hero, who loved in return. The hero is a young lawyer, with so keen a sense of honor that he had resolved never to marry an heiress, fearing it might be said he wedded for money. They were to marry when the hero had gained sufficient foothold to establish his professional success. And lo, while they waited, the lady, through the death of a distant and almost unknown relative, fell heir to a property larger than she had originally possessed. The young man, true to his sense of honor, gave her her freedom in a short note, although the act cost him a great pang. This brought from the young lady a longer note, asking him to reconsider his action, and requesting an interview. He thanked her by post for her kindness, and told her that as an equal in wealth he would have been honored by a union with her, but that now she was in a position to make a much more desirable alliance. The days that followed this generouse renunciation of wealth and happiness were sad ones for the young lawyer. About a week after breaking off his engagement the young man was startled by the appearance in his office of the girl he had given up. She smiled beamingly and said: "If you will not marry me let us at any rate be friends. I need the advice of counsel in a suit which I am about to bring, and for the sake of old times I hope you will do your best for me." "By all means," replied the astonished disciple of Blackstone. "If you will give the facts of the case I will attend to it at once." "I wish to bring a suit of damages for breach of promise against—. I would not do this only I know he loves me still and will not marry me because he thinks I can wait and do better." It is needless to say that the case was compromised and never brought into court.

Treatment of Baldness.

A few words anent one of the most common forms of skin diseases among us. Baldness is so widely spread, and so universal among us, that it is quite fashionable. Nevertheless, I shall give a couple of recipes for that form that is accompanied by falling of dandruff, what is technically know as dry seborrhea of the scalp. In nine-tenths of these cases; a cure is possible, that is, hair may be restored if sufficient patience is allotted with other treatment. Owing to barbers' failure to give back to a man his hair, a general impression exists that it is no use to try; once bald, always bald.

This is scarcely ever true of seborrhea, not in fifty per cent. of cases from other causes, and whosoever will try these recipes will be convinced of their efficacy.

For a week, at the outset of treatment, the scalp is to be thoroughly washed with a reliable tar soap, such as any apothecary sells, drying the hair thoroughly, but not rinsing out the tar. If hair has vanished let the lather dry upon bare spots. Then begin with a wash composed of resorcin pure, one dram; castor oil, one-half ounce; bay rum, 7½ ounces. Mix.

This is to be applied morning and night, and well rubbed in. After two weeks of lotion, have the following pomade prepared, and rub into the scalp and hair a portion the size of a hazel nut every morning: Salicylic acid, ten grains; ammonated mercury, five grains; cold cream, one ounce. Mix.

After one week's careful attention to this treatment, the bald spots will be covered with a fine, thick, silky growth, that is forerunner to a crop worth having.

Try it.—Dr. Hutchinson, in American Magazine.

A Kiss in the Dark.

Horace Vernet, the artist, was going from Versailles to Paris by railway. In the same compartment with him were two ladies whom he had never seen before, but who were evidently acquainted with him. They examined him minutely and commented freely upon his material bearing, his hale old age, the style of his dress, etc. They continued their annoyance until finally the painter determined to put an end to the persecution. As the train passed through the tunnel of St. Cloud, the three travelers were wrapt in complete darkness. Vernet raised the back of his hand to his mouth and kissed it twice violently. on emerging from the obscurity he found the ladies had withdrawn their attention from him, and were accusing each other of having been kissed by the man in the dark.

Presently they arrived at Paris, and Vernet, on leaving them, said: "Ladies, I shall be puzzled all my life by the inquiry, which of these two ladies it was that kissed me?"—St. Louis Republic.

Lucky Jest.

The French author Martinville, who began his career toward the close of the last century, is said to have owed the preservation of his life to a witty piece of audacity. He was a Royalist, and did not hesitate to attack the French revolution and its authorities. Presently, of course, he was summoned to appear before the revolutionary tribunal, with the terrible Fouquier at its head.

The revolutionary tribunals at that time did not hesitate to send everybody to the guillotine who had ventured to attack them. Martinville expected to go with the rest of the victims.

"What is your name?" asked the revolutionary judge.

"Martainville," said the young author,

"Martainville!" exclaimed the judge. "You are deceiving us, and trying to hide your rank. You are an aristocrat, and your name is De Martainville."

"Citizen President," exclaimed the young man, "I am here to be shortened, not lengthened! Leave me my name!"

A true Frenchman loves witticism above all things, and the tribunal was so much pleased by Martainville's grim response, that it spared his life.

The loss is about $75,000. The bridge will probably be rebuilt as soon as possible. All points of interest along the river at the water's edge suffered more or less. The water was never known to be so high.

Information has reached Spokane Falls of the fatally shooting of Sergeant Callahan by Joe Moran at Fort Spokane, 200 miles northwest of the Falls. The shooting occurred in a dance house of which Moran was the proprietor. Callahan paid attention to Morgan's wife and aroused the latter's jealousy. A quarrel ensued, and both men drew their guns. Morgan got the drop on his opponent and sent three bullets through his body.

A little book of more than ordinary interest has just been published by Col. Hans Mattson. It relates to the 250th anniversary of the Swedish settlements in America and contains valuable historical information from old colonial times. There is in it a fine picture of the old Swedes' church at Wilmington, Del., one of the most valuable antiquities in the country.

The eloquent and instructive address delivered on the occasion by Hon. W. W. Thomas, Jr., is also given in full; and Hon. Pennock Pusey, for many years a well known citizen of this state but now a resident at Wilmington, contributes a most interesting and finely written historical sketch of the Swedes in both hemispheres. Less voluminous, though hardly inferior in interest, are several letters from persons in some way indentified with the history and fate of the Delaware Swedes. Prominent among these, is the present secretary of state, Hon. T. F. Bayard, who, with feeling and evident pleasure, refers to the many ties that link himself and his family to the Swedish settlements on the Delaware. The secretary indeed traced his ancestry on the maternal side back to a Swedish lady who married Joseph Willing, an Englishman from Bristol who owned the land on which the first Swedish settlement was made, and from whom the present city of Wilmington derives its name.

The book is neatly gotten up, and in order to defray the cost of publication a limited number will be offered for sale. Every student of American history should read the book, and it ought to be preserved in the libraries of the country.

It will be sent, post paid, on receipt of $1 per copy, or of $5 for six. Orders should be addressed to Col. H. Mattson, Capitol, St. Paul, Minn.

Albert Lobetta, the Bohemian anarchist who was hanged by enraged citizens at Gilman, Wash., for attempting to blow up a house, is not known to the police of Chicago. If he was a member of one of the "groups he must have been one of those whose names were concealed by friends and whose connection with the plans of the agitators will forever remain a secret. Detective Nordrum, who knows the private records of as many decided anarchists in the city as Bonfield himself, says that Lobetta's name is not on his books.

The Senatorial Contest.

Lake Superior News.

As the day for the assembling of the legislature approaches, it is apparent that the fight for the United States senatorship is narrowing down to a contest between the present incumbent and W. D Washburn. Dark horse calculations are ruled out, and it seems to be simply a question as to who shall control the necessary vote on an early ballot. The campaign has been a warm one, and no intelligent member of the legislature ought to come to the capitol unprepared to cast his vote one way or the other.

From the begining of the campaign to the present moment D. M. Sabin has steadily grown in favor. His services during the six years he has been in the senate have been discussed, and not one charge affecting his honesty, capacity and intelligence, has been brought forward by his enemies, though they have not been slow in saying all the ugly things they could about him of a personal nature. Good common sense has been the chief characteristic of Mr. Sabin's official acts. He has won friends for himself and for the state by his methods with his colleagues, and it is said of him that he can accomplish more in the senate on the score of pure personal good feeling and friendship than any other member of that body. Such a man should not be lost to the state. Minnesota has much to ask for, and the Twin cities should not be the only beneficiaries. The best sentiment of the state favors the re-election of Hon. D. M. Sabin.

A Trial of Strength Between the Country and the Twin Cities.

Duluth Tribune.

Next Tuesday week the first ballot will be taken in the legislature upon the election of an United States senator to succeed D. M. Sabin. It is more than probable that Mr. Sabin will succeed himself, but it is pretty dry weather and all signs are liable to fail. The mode of electing the senator is as follows: First of all a ballot is taken in the senate and in the house, and if both bodies agree upon the same man that settles it; but if they do not, and they are not very likely to do so in this case, a joint convention of both houses is held, and they ballot away until one party is knocked out.

Washburn's supporters are reported to be working like beavers, but they are mostly paid men and do not seem to have as much heart in their work as the Sabin crowd. Then comes Donnelly, and the Sage is a host in himself. He is able to hold and control a certain definite strength, and there is no doubt but that all his strength will ultimately come to Sabin. To use the language of a politician fresh from the scene of the conflict, "Washburn has got the papers and plenty of hired men to work for him, but Sabin has got hosts of friends and a finely organized system of work upon his side. Both have all the money that is needed, but in this fight that does not cut much figure."

Among those from Duluth who are doing good work for Sabin, Hon. G. G. Hartley is conspicuous, and he is doing yeoman's service among his friends from the northern part of the state. It is not quite, however, a fight between the northern and southern sections of the state, as it is a conceded fact that Washburn has not a single solid delegation from any county. It is more of a fight of the country at large against the centralization of all legislative power in the Twin cities, and it is dollars to dimes that the country will win.

Not Unanimous.

Mankato Free Press.

Blue Earth is not, it seems, the only county where efforts are being made to make it appear that the sentiment is unanimous for Washburn for Senator. A telegram from Pipestone gives the following information: There was considerable indignation here among farmers and others yesterday over a purported interview in Sunday's Pioneer Press with Senator W. B. Brown, of this county, in which Mr. Brown is quoted as saying that the farmers, merchants and all here are in favor of Washburn for United States Senator. Nothing further from the truth could have been thought of, and if Mr. Brown told any such thing he misrepresented the people wilfully. It is safe to say that there are not half a dozen farmers in Pipestone County in favor of Washburn under any circumstances, but between him and Sabin, the latter is far preferable. Beyond one of the bankers here, there is not a single business man who indorses Washburn.

State Press.

Northfield News: Gen. Washburn must consider his canvass for the Senatorship a hopeless one when he finds it necessary to have the Minnesota Medical Journal devote a page to an editorial diagnosing the situation and prescribing "General William Drew Washburn" as the only remedy applicable.

Duluth Herald: The supposition at political headquarters is that John L. Gibbs will be re-appointed on the railroad commission. Mr. Gibbs has made a good commissioner and has always endeavored to do justice to Duluth. He was, however, in the minority and his desires have been overruled. With another man like John L. Gibbs on the commission Duluth will have no cause to complain.

Detroit Record: One of the first bills to be introduced in the state senate came from Senator Holmes, and it provides for furnishing seed grain to farmers whose crops were destroyed by the frosts of last August. The Minneapolis Journal says the bill provides for notice by county auditors on or before Feb. 15, that applicants for said grain may file their applications before March 1. These applications are to contain definite statements of the number of acres to be seeded, amount of grain harvested last, and various other details. The county commissioners are to form boards of adjustment when dispute arises, and no applicant is to secure grain in excess of $100 in value. The governor is authorized to apportion the amounts called for the different counties, if not in excess of $100,000 in the aggregate. Various minor provisions are made. The bill was given its first reading and laid over under the rules.

Warren Sheaf: Although The Sheaf in the early part of the senatorial contest tooted its horn for W. D. Washburn as candidate for Senator we can hardly see how we can continue tooting on that horn. By inquiry and investigation we have found, that while Mr. Washburn may be a very fine man socially and a good man to look after the interests of Mr. Washburn, he is not the man the northern part of Minnesota want for their next senator. Mr. Washburn is fast becoming a railroad king and we have enough of railroads kings. What we want is a man whose principle interests are with the people and not the vast number of railroads centering in the Twin cities. A man who has a record as a man for the farmer and not for the railroad monopoly. Of the two leaders in the race, we believe that Hon. D. M. Sabin is such a man, and for this reason The Sheaf feels in duty bound to support him as the man who will do the most for the interest of the people in the northwest.

Duluth Herald: The Moorhead News has done some interesting figuring regarding the Fifth congressional district. The total vote cast in the district on November 6, last, was by the official count, 59,435. Of these S. G. Comstock received 23,831, and Scott 4,254. Comstock's plurality, 7,519. If we multiply the total vote by 5.83, the multiple used by good statisticians, it produces 346,506, which indicates the population of the district. This is sufficient for two congressmen and leave a large fraction 150,000 people being the basis of representation in use since the apportionment under the census of 1880. Carrying out the same principle to the total vote of the state, which was 263,285, it shows an aggregate population of over 1,539,000, or sufficient to give the state ten representatives in congress. It is interesting to note the great difference in the voting population of the several congressional districts. Thus, the First cast 37,382 votes; the Second, 45,118; the Third, 37,493; the Fourth, 82,373, and the Fifth, 59,485.

Kittson County Enterprise: This week, Capt. Enstrom, who has been one of our old settlers, also one of the most efficient county officials the county has ever had, takes his departure for St. Paul where he will remain during the winter at least. On Monday he closed up his business as clerk of the court, having been appointed by Mr. Wallace to fill an unexpired term. His large financial interests will require his return next season in order that he can get them closed up more satisfactory than he has been able to do this year. Wherever he goes, the good wishes of our people accompany him.

Northfield News: The senatorial question is far from settled at this writing. The Washburn men claim enough votes to elect him. Ignatius Donnelly shows some strength and promises to surprise the people when a ballot for Senator is called for. Senator Sabin and his friends are not claiming a unanimous vote but their earnest work is alarming the opposition. What are known as dark horses are plentiful but they are hitched in the shade. It is easier to say who will not win than who will. There will be something done before another week passes.

Northfield News: Before the election of Col. C. H. Graves, of Duluth, Speaker of the House, the Washburn men claimed that Mr. Morgan would be elected and his election would be a guaranty that W. D. Washburn would be elected United States Senator. Since Morgan's defeat the Washburnites have been industriously engaged in showing that the result of the speakership election had no bearing on the election of Senator. There will probably be no wash on the name of the next senator elected in Minnesota.

Battle Lake Review: Senator Sabin is gaining ground in the Senatorial race every day, and his opponents begin to realize that he is going to win. The Sabin men did not "show up" at the start like some others we might mention, but they have at last succeeded in getting their man way to the front where he will be found at the finish. "He who laughs last laughs best."

Pipestone Star: Mr. Sabin's record in the United States senate on behalf of the people of this great state of Minnesota is unassailable. His only misfortune now, apparently, seems to be that he does not reside in the city of Minneapolis, and it looks at this distance as though this misfortune will follow any man who aspires to the United States senatorship, unless the legislature forcibly demonstrate that St Paul and Minneapolis are in Minnesota, instead of Minnesota being in St. Paul and Minneapolis.

Mankato Free Press: So far as the senatorial question is concerned the Free Press is heartily in favor of the re-election of Senator Sabin. He is acknowledged to be one of the best buisness men in the senate to-day, and on all questions of public concern he is in direct line with the more advanced republican ideas. Especially is this true of matters touching upon the welfare of the people of the northwest. His position on the tariff is such as to commend him while his public uterances in the senate on the right of the government to regulate interstate railroad tariffs long before congress took the matter up, proves him to be far seeing and sound in his views. Senator Sabin is of the people.

Excelsior Mirror: In the midst of the senatorial contest which is developing strong friends for numerous candidates, it is easy to discover a disposition to smirch Mr. Sabin on account of prejudice against his connection with the manufacturing company at Stillwater. Investigating committees have justified him; numerous cases have been brought into court resulting in a vindication of Mr. Sabin. In business management or official capacity, Mr. Sabin has been honorable both to individuals and to parties. The desperate schemes to down him failed, and the strong language used by Senator Davis, who was not particularly friendly with Sabin, is both a record of fact and an expression of confidence.

Le Sueur News: Nothing can be brought against Senator D. M. Sabin, and there is a change of sentiment in his favor in these portions of the state which have heretofore been pronounced for Washburn that is truly very significant. The people of this state want a man in whom they can expect true and honest representation; one who stands closest to their own interests to bias and influence his vote, at the expense of the masses of the people; one whom they can approach with that freedom and familliarity that gives them an assurance that they are cheerfully heard and that their requests will be most faithfully and diligently looked after. Just such a man they have in Senator Sabin. Now, we don't ask anyone to take a positive stand, or to commit themselves to Sabin or any other man until they have thoroughly investigated the whole situation, and all legislators who do this make a grave mistake.

Ellsworth News: There is no question but what Senator Sabin will be returned, but we want to see it by such a voice that no one will have ground to doubt that the people of Minnesota fail to appreciate his noble effort in their behalf and understand full well how to reward such worthy qualifications and actions.

Star News: Both Graves and Morgan remained at the Merchants hotel Monday evening and as soon as the result was announced Mr. Morgan went to the room of his successful rival and gracefully congratulated him upon his success.

Northfield News: The Minneapolis Journal says that Mr. Merriam's manner has changed very much since election. Almost anyone's manner would change with the great crowd of office-seekers worrying him. Give the man a chance; it will be time enough to criticise him when he does not do the proper thing.

Minneapolis Tribune: While there were many who were disappointed at the defeat of Mr. Morgan the legislators of Minnesota have no reason as a body to do anything but congratulate themselves upon the selection of so able and so experienced a man as Mr. Graves. His nomination by so handsome a majority may assuredly be taken as proof of his worth and fitness for the place, which he will fill with ability and credit to his constituency

Star News: The selection of Mr. Graves, of Duluth, for speaker by the republican house caucus was a brilliant victory for the Sabin cause. The partizen Washburn organs may attempt to disguise it, but the fact remains. If the readers of those same organs will turn back to their issue of Saturday last, they will see the opinion expressed that the senatorial contest turned upon the speakership contest and that Graves, defeat would insure Sabin's utter and irretrievable ruin.

Minneapolis Journal: Mr. Graves' election was due to two things; Duluth is entitled to more recognition than she has been able to claim heretofore. She has outgrown the old apportionment till the injustice of the present basis of representation is greater in her case than is that of almost any other part of the state. The effect of this was to create a feeling akin to sympathy in favor of Mr. Graves. In addition to that he is eminently qualified for the position. It would have been practically impossible to defeat him.

New York Press: It may be accepted as a fact that Mr. Blaine will be the Secretary of State of the next administration. The appointment of Mr. Blaine is undoubtedly a wise, just and statesmanlike act on the part of the President-elect. It is wise because it indicates a strong Cabinet, just because from a political standpoint Mr Blaine's friends are entitled to a representation in the Cabinet, and statesman like because Mr. Blaine represents in a marked degree the principles of protection and the idea of a strong and patriotic foreign policy. The appointment of Mr. Blaine demonstrates the fact that an able man has nothing to fear by calling around him the support of the biggest brains and strongest characters in his party. To suppose that Mr. Blaine or any other man will overshadow the next President of the United States is derogatory to General Harrison and in direct opposition to his well-known character. He, at least, has carried himself throughout the canvass and since election with dignity and ability, and impressed his individuality upon the country so strongly and so favorable that no unprejudiced citizen of either political party could truthfully assert that the next administration will be anything but a Harrison administration to the core.

Philadelphia Press: Nobody who may go into the Cabinet will undertake to dispute the primacy with the President. Nobody will be disposed to do it. Whoever may be called to the Cabinet will recognize the obligation and share the inclination to support and strengthen the chief loyally and dutifully. The biggest of counselors is not big enough to be anything else than subordinate. Mr. Blaine and Mr. Sherman are, by common consent, the two republican leaders of greatest experience, force, ability, and strength, and both of them might be put in the Cabinet without detracting from the pre-eminence of the President or doing anything but add to its luster. Whether either or both or neither should be taken is a question that may be entirely free from any such considerations. Whoever shall be chosen will, first of all, be loyal to the chief. He might be independent and critical outside, but inside he could only be faithful and devoted.

New York Mail and Express: A month ago we took occasion to say that this peculiarly American industry (Cabinet-making) was not only harmless, at the present juncture but was likely to yield good results. We felt sure that General Harrison would not be disturbed by it and that he would not limit it proportions by any statements that would indicate his own preference or intentions. Since that time scores of eminent statesmen and accomplished journalists have visited Indianapolis, have had courteous hearing and kindly treatment, and have come away with a realizing sense of the wisdom of Josh Billing's saying that "it is better not to know so much than to know so many things that ain't so," and that General Harrison is not only likely to be president all the time and under all circumstances, but that he has found that the necessary condition of his success is to be found in keeping his own counsel absolutely, while seeking all the counsel and information he can from all sorts and sizes of advisers.

Baltimore News: Mr. Blaine will likely go into the Cabinet; he is the strongest republican in the country; he gave General Harrison his nomination and contributed immensely to his election. If Mr. Harrison does not want him he will display a small piece of jealousy; if he does not appoint him, he will show himself an ingrate. There is no doubt, however, that Mr. Blaine will be offered the portfolio of state, and that General Harrison will wisely surround himself with the ablest advisers in the party. He could not do this and leave Mr. Blaine out. He will not take many from the Senate, because he will not wish to weaken his party in that body, but with a strong Cabinet and an earnest ambition and patriotism he will do the best he can to maintain his country as the first among nations. In doing this he should receive the honest support of all Americans regardless of party. Being thus equipped and sustained his administration will be passed upon and judged by its merits and results three years hence.

McKINNON BRO'S,
McKinnon Block, Main Street.

Peterson's Magazine for February is fully equal to the high standard set by its January number. "The Last Day at Home" is a beautiful steel-engraving. The two full-page wood-illustrations, "Cupid Tobogganing" and "The Mill Ford," are both excellent. The large fashion-plate and the endless needle-work designs are perfect in their way, and the literary contents are admirable. Edgar Fawcett's serial, "The Murder in Lafayette Place," is one of the most intense and dramatic pieces of work we have ever seen from his pen; and the other novelet, by the author of "A Second Life," continues worthy of its brilliant commencement. The short stories are all capital, and their variety is exceedingly noticeable. The department "Things Worth Knowing," which was started last year, has become a feature of great interest. This month, Harriet Latham has an article called "Hints About the Guest Chamber," which every housekeeper who likes pretty things and has only limited means at her command will find invaluable. A year's subscription will well repay any lady. Terms: Two dollars a year, with great reductions when taken in clubs. Address Peterson's Magazine, 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., JANUARY 17, 1889.

Keeping up The Flow of Milk.

J. H. Monrad, in Bureau of Dairy Information.

One of the reasons why the Danish dairymen, as a rule, are successful, is the system of winter dairying, having the cows calve in October and November, then feed them well during the winter, is that in the spring just at the time when the cows would naturally commence drying up, they are let out on the pastures and the milk secretion is thus stimulated and the result in dollars and cents speaks for it-self.

How is it here? The cows get the benefit of the best grass at their best milking period and just in proportion as the cows dry up the feed is diminishing, thus accelerating drying up.

Last year it was dry in the middle of the summer and but very few farmers were shrewd and provident enough to keep up their flow by soiling, the result was, that the majority had very little benefit of the excellent fall grazing. This year, the report in Elgin and at the cheese board of trade in Wisconsin are all very discouraging, in fact there is a shrinkage of about twenty five per cent. against what it would have been if the fall grazing had been as good as last year. It is a mystery to me how farmers, who know better, allow their cows to fall off in milk more than nature insists on.

They know that a comparatively small outlay in the shape of green fodder or grain feed given whenever the grass is not sufficient to keep up the milk flow, is repaid ten times' not only by the increased yield during the shortage, but by keeping it up, ready to take advantage of the better conditions later on, and surely there is not a man who ever handled cows at all but what knows that it is next to impossible to get up the old milk flow after it once has been reduced by—well why not use the right word? starvation!

It may be said that my sermon on the above text is rather late,—in fact a kind of shutting the barn door after the horse has got away. But if the readers will kindly take their own observation and use the coming winter to reflect I hope they may not only acknowledge the truth of my remarks but also act upon them next year.

If they will remember every time they feed their cows during the coming winter that if they had been a little more liberal during the past month, they might just as well have had twice or thrice the quantity of milk on the same feed during the coming three months; if they will remember that if Bessy had been taken in the barn and fed the first frosty nights she might have given 1000 lbs more milk during the season, and that at a season when the milk is most valuable she might have given profit instead of loss.

I say—if they will remember this three times a day during the coming winter whenever they feed their cows, whether they be dry or give one quart instead of three, there may be a hope that they will act more wisely next year and keep up the flow of milk.

We have in this country the best of fodder plant to eke out any lack of grass. I mean the corn, whether it be cut green and fed at once, or whether it be given in shape of ensilage later on in the season. That, and a few pounds (even if it be only two) of bran, is all there is needed, and every farmer who aspires to be a successful dairyman should make use of it.

Cooking Food for Cows.

The Prairie Farmer.

In connection with the statement sometime since made by the Praire Farmer, that careful experiments have not clearly shown that steamed or boiled food could be made economical for live-stock, we find that the Royal Agricultural Society of England has been working in the same direction. A large number of questions were sent out, not especially referring to dairy cows, but the replies received give incidentally much information on this subject. In relating to the benefit of warm food it is found, according to an English writer, "that thirteen out of thirty-one specify the benefits that are derived from giving cows in milk a warm, sloppy mess in winter time, while only two or three give a direct negative to this, the remainder expressing no opinion. Of the two or three negatives again, they refer more to fattening cattle than to cows, so that they may be quite correct as regards these, but with respect to milking stock, the writer of this article has no hesitation in saying that they are wrong, and in siding with the thirteen affirmatives."

In continuation, the writer says: "It must, of course, be understood that there are cooked foods and cooked foods, and that the particular variety given has a great deal to do with the success of the system. Mere 'steaming' is of little use; the writer has come across cases where this has been tried, and given up as unsatisfactory, and he is inclined to think that this is the reason of the objections to the system which some have; they have tried the wrong plan, and finding it unsatisfactory, have condemned the whole system. On the other hand, actual boiling or cooking in a copper is going too far; the results will be satisfactory, but they will be equally so with less trouble. We find that if the chaff or chop is simply soaked in boiling water, and allowed to 'infuse' for several hours, that the maximum good is procured in this way. In practice, the trollies or 'coolers' are filled up with the cut straw or hay, run in below the spout of a raised-up copper, and the boiling water turned on and filled up to the top of the chaff. This is the minimum of labor and expense connected with the system, with the most beneficial results.

"It is, of course, customary and necessary with cows in milk to give various kinds of meals, and they are best given as one of the ingredients of the mess, mixed either with the chaff before putting on the water, or afterwards, as each bucketful is served out to the animals. Of course there are modifications of this plan equally successful, such as merely damping a heap of chaff and meal with cold water. But to our mind a part of the good is lost by following this practice, because it is one of the objects of the system to supply the food warm—at about blood-heat, if possible—and another object is to give plenty water—sloppy—so as to stimulate the flow of milk, and render the drinking of water per se by the animals almost unnecessary."

North Minnesota.

A Farmer Writes to the Country Gentleman and Receives Suggestions.

St. Paul Globe.

The farmers of this valley are discouraged by the loss of the wheat crop this season. Some are trying to work into dairying, and we intend to start a creamery. I have attempted to make my dairy a winter one, but for the want of working capital have not fully succeeded. I will give the prices of hay grain, etc., and should like your opinion as to the profit of feeding new milch cows, usually grade Shorthorns that can be bought for $25 to $35, giving 10 or 12 quarts of milk, perhaps more with suitable feed; with milk at 10 and 11 cents a gallon, and butter at 20 to 25 cents per lb. Our hay is wild, but the cows eat it as readily and as clean as the timothy that I have sometimes had; usually some weeds among it—perhaps 5 to 20 per cent. This is one reason why I have not wanted to cut the hay fine, as it would seem to be a waste of meal to mix it with it. I can buy such hay at $4 per ton; oat straw for hauling, probably $2 per ton; bran $11.60 per ton; Shorts, $12.60; oil meal $30; ground oats $16.50; corn meal, about $20 or $22; ground rejected wheat $17. I cannot get corn fodder or millet this winter, but expect to raise it another season. Millet would cost $5 or $7 per ton. C. B. K., Glyndon, Minn.

[C. B. K. has a low market for milk and butter, perhaps lower for the milk than the butter. Yet he has this to encourage him—his foods, according to real value, are, perhaps, as low in price as his milk. If his prairie hay had been cut in blossom, he would find it as valuable per ton if well cured as common meadow hay at the east. If he can select such as was cut early, he will not find the weeds very troublesome, and if it were run through the cutter, and his ground foods mixed in, in the manner that he did at the east, he would find that his cows would eat it up clean. It is presumed that in such a cold climate he has a warm stable to feed in, else his milk production would be small with the best ration. His bran and shorts are cheaper grain foods for milk than any others he mentions. It would not be best to feed corn meal at the price he gives; the ground rejected wheat is cheaper; the ground oats are also cheaper. He may make up the following ration: Sixteen pounds cut prairie hay, eight pounds bran and shorts, mixed in equal parts by weight; four pounds ground oats, three pounds ground rejected wheat, one pound oil meal. The ground feed should be well mixed together dry, and then mixed with the moistened cut hay. Let this ration be given in three feeds, smallest at noon. This ration would cost, at his figures for food, 15½c per day, and two and one-half gallons per day would bring, at the lowest price, 25c, leaving a balance of 10c to cover labor and use of capital. This is a small margin, but it is quite as large as dairymen of the east receive. The ration here given is a full one for the class of cows which he describes, and if they are good milkers should produce at least fifteen quarts per day, and this would make the margin quite interesting. E. W. S.

Exercise For Colts.

Rural World: One of the mistakes made by breeders of horses is keeping the colts confined in stables and in stable yards in winter. They may be ever so well fed, but food is not enough to develop colts. They need abundant exercise, and if they have the run of the fields and are well fed they will play and take a good deal of exercise. This play develops not only muscle and bone, but lungs and heart, and gives tone and strength and growth to the body. If facilities are not at hand for giving colts the freedom of the fields then exercise should be given them by the owner. Colts may be driven with benefit at a much earlier age than was formerly supposed. We do not mean that they should be hitched to heavy loads at an early age, but we do mean that at the age of one or two years they may be driven hitched to a light vehicle several miles a day, with benefit if they cannot get the exercise in other ways. As the sturdy oak cannot be grown in a flower pot in a lady's parlor, but to develop it to its full power must feel the storm and the sunshine, so to have a speedy, vigorous colt it must have exercise, work, training; its muscles must be hardened, its lungs expanded and its heart pulsations prepared for supreme contests by the kinds of work that it will be called upon to perform. Do not kill the colts by kindness, any more than you would by working them too much. Observe that golden mean which is so necessary to the highest success in all undertakings. We know of many valuable colts whose power for usefulness and whose value would be greatly increased if they could have the right kind of training the present winter. Kept in their stalls and stables their systems suffer for the want of the pure air and that physical exercise required for the healthy development of their vital forces.

Duluth Evening Herald: As the senatorial fight in St. Paul draws to a close, the contest becomes interesting. In fact the Merchants' hotel, for years headquarters for Minnesota politicians, has resolved itself into one big pool room and bets on Washburn and Sabin are freely offered, one bluff being $16,000 by a Washburn man. If the leaders are not as confident as they were about the success of their favorite, they are willing to bet the other fellow will not get there. The result of the speakership contest will probably determine who Minnesota's next senator will be. If Graves gets there Sabin will be re-elected. If Morgan is elected, Washburn will probably be the winner, and if both Graves and Morgan are defeated the senatorial jumble will be just as bad as it was before.

Proper Food for Cows.

The Western Rural.

Mr. Cheeve, one of the most careful agricultural writers we have, says in his New England Farmer that food has two offices to perform in animal economy, to keep the animal warm, and to give it force, and foods are classed as heat producers or force producers. Heat is supplied by carbonaceous food while force is derived from nitregenous material, and that food is best for the animal in which these elements are in such proportion to each other as the condition of the animal calls for. Foods are classed as rich when they contain a large proportion of nitregenous or force producing elements, and poor when they are the reverse. Cotton seed meal, wheat bran, gluten meal and well made clover hay are all comparatively rich foods; while bog hay, grain-straw or over ripe or weather beaten English hay are all inferior because they lack a due proportion of force producing material. The same kind of food is required to produce milk that is required to produce force, so the working ox, or horse, like the cow in milk, requires rich food or food containing a high proportion of nitregenous material.

The statement has been often made that a cow will require daily a given per cent of food to her live weight, usually two to two and a half per cent, or twenty to twenty-five pounds for an animal weighing 1,000 pounds. While this may be approximately correct we should remember that the richer and more concentrated the food the fewer pounds may be required. A pound of wheat bran may be equal to two pounds of English hay or three or four pounds of meadow hay. It should be remembered too that while ten pounds of good English hay may be a perfect ration for a small heifer, it does not follow that twenty pounds of meadow hay that would show by analysis to be half as rich would in practic be of equal feeding value to that same heifer. There is a limit to the ability of the animal to chew and digest bulky food. If too much bulk be crowded into the machine, the machine may get clogged or "bust." So if we have poor fodder to feed it is always wise to mix it with rich grain rather than to feed it in excessive quantity.

Draft Horse Breeding.

IT IS PROFITABLE ON WHEAT FARMS.

For Orange Judd Farmer, by a N. W. Rambler.

When outside critics, familiar with more easterly methods of farming, hear of the sweeping losses made by Dakota wheat growers the past summer, they very naturally ask, "Why do they run such risks? If they followed mixed farming as we do, they would be far safer." Until I came here I never saw anything else but mixed farming, and had entire faith in it. But there are exceptions to all rules. I try to see with both eyes when wandering over these far stretching prairies, and now looking back over the last ten years experience, with its painful though salutary checks upon bonanza wheat farming, I can not see how, with the light they had, they could have done otherwise. The soil, the climate, the vast possibilities and exceptional high quality of the product, compared with the low cost of production, were all weighty reasons why capitalists as well as smaller men should embark freely in wheat raising. Summer frost, the latest bug-bear of ours, was then comparatively unknown; hail was unthought of, and even now, knowing as I do the worst things that have befallen them, I am not preparep to advise any radical change in their program. But there is one thing they can do, and in many instances are already doing, which can be worked in entire harmony and profit with their present system. I mean

THE RAISING OF DRAFT COLTS.

Fine horse breeding is a specialty with which no ordinary farmer should intermeddle; and there are good reasons why they should be very chary of dabbling in crosses between the farm mares and "speeding" sires of any sort. There are fewer objections and greater inducements to raising well graded draft horses on wheat farms than any other possible grade, and fewer difficulties with surer profits in this than in any other stock which can possibly be tried on such farms. In the early days mules were the favorite stock. They are hard to kill, and can live for months in winter on straw, which costs nothing. But they cost money to buy and can not reproduce themselves. Whether you run a quarter section or twenty sections, you can, by good management, and at a minimum cost, keep your farm going, and with reasonable care turn out from one to forty colts a year. One such colt, a year old, is worth from $75 to $100, and though in a good year wheat growing brings in money much faster, it somehow, turns out that after five wheat years, such as we have had in the past, the sum total of results is all in favor of the colts. Meat may sell at 50 cts. or $1.25, a good horse has a fixed value all the time.

THE FACTS PLAINLY STATED.

There is no conjuring in this business. You start on a quarter section farm with say a good gelding, an old mare and a younger one, and with some knowledge from previous experience. You think a man who wades into a river and narrowly escapes drowning, next door to an idiot, if, after you have fished him out, he explains that he was not until now aware he could not swim. But when a man quits a telegraph office or dry goods store, with a little money and wades into farming out west, he usually sets down his bad luck to the discredit of the blooming country. You, guided by wiser counsel, know what you are doing, and breed your mares to a full-blooded draft—Clyde, Percheron, Shire—but never to a "general purpose horse." One or both may hold and hold and the necessary care you bestow on them next winter will save you from the temptation to spend all your spare time in "seeing life." You study their comfort and health, keep out drafts, and have if possible a loose box stall in which a mare can feel at ease, and your two colts next winter do the same. Get rid of your halters, give them moderate and pretty regular work during pregnancy. Late colts are now coming into favor as the mare can do nursing all winter. But I assume yours are to come in May. These two mares can do half or two-thirds of a day's work in seed time and get no harm, while your odd horse is doing his full share of work, and if there has been no violent strain for the last few months to cause abortion or some other form of disaster, you will raise year by year one or two good colts, the handling and training of which will fill up pleasantly many a dull, idle hour. If he has not got blemished by standing too much tied by a halter, or by running against a harrow or reaper when frolicking in the yard,

HE WILL PAY FOR HIS KEEP

from three years old, by spring and harvest work in their season, and at five or six years sell in the nearest city at a good price always. If a filly, she may be bred at two years and raise a good colt at three. Such horses so educated are far more valuable than the uncircumcised Philistines that are lassoed when four years old, "broken" and sold east. The farm colt is familiar with engines of all sorts, is hitched up in spring and fall beside an old stager; does not go wild at sight of a newspaper, or sound of a brass band, is, in short, fit to take its place in a civilized community. Some ranch colts get into training wonderfully easy, but my list of farmers killed or maimed by bronchos, especially those of the scrub variety, is growing longer every week. An Irish friend remarks: "I wud'nt hey one o' thim beasts for nothin'; all the min on the farm can't catch thim, and whin ye've got thim they're worth nothin'." A man from Dakota says: "Everybody laughed when I gave $25 for service to my mares, but my two colts, even though sold at a disadvantage, have laid in my winter groceries and paid all my bills, when people round me are broken up by the frost." It does not matter whether you own two mares or forty. If you are prudent, painstaking and reasonably skillful, they will prove, in spite of a mischance or two, as sound as any stock on four legs that you can put money into, on a prairie wheat farm.

How Much Wheat Shall we Sow?

Farm, Stock and Home.

Carefully calculated estimates of the wheat supply of the United States at the end of 1888 indicated an exportable surplus of about 80,000,000 bushels. From Dec. 31, 1887, to the end of that crop year our exports of wheat aggregated 55,000,000 bushels, but the exports are now running, and for several months past have run very much lighter than for a corresponding period one year ago, and there is at the present time no indication of an increased outflow, and consequently no channel is in sight through which to float our surplus. The aftermath of last fall's great speculative boom is likely to prove anything but a profitable crop to our wheat growers. During the past few months American speculators have been teaching Europe how to be independent of American wheat, and the indications are that the pupil has been an apt one, and that the lesson it has learned will seriously plague us for years to come.

It is undoubtedly true that a small but very rich coterie of gamblers—beg pardon,—speculators, are now in position to pay a big price to the fellow who will help them let go of the high priced wheat and flour they own; they can't let go themselves without getting hurt, and no power can loosen their grip but that of fate, and fate is now working to relax it, regardless of whether it hurts or not, in the way of small exports, lessened home consumption, by reason of the high price of flour, and the now notorious fact that there is, after all, a surplus of wheat in the country. A few figures bearing upon this matter may be of advantage to those of our readers who are now deciding about how much seed wheat they had better buy, or how many acres they had better sow.

The actual yield of wheat in 1887 was 430,000,000 bushels. The yield for 1888 is now known to have been 406,000,000 bushels. It is contended by some that this really means not over 375,000,000 bushels of good wheat. Rather than argue this matter we will call the crop of '88 the latter amount, or 55,000,000 bushels less in '88 than in '87. The exports for '87, reducing flour to wheat, were 132,456,703 bushels. In '88 they were 86,678,599, a falling off of almost 46,000,000, or nearly as much as the largest estimated shrinkage of our crop; the difference, however, will be more than made up in lessened home consumption. Substantially all of this great shrinkage occurred during the fall and early winter months. A fair indication of the extent of this latter-day shrinkage is given by a comparison of wheat and flour for the following weeks: For the week ending Dec. 24, 1887, the exports of flour were 329,615 bbls; of wheat, 491,716 bushels. For the corresponding week in '88 the exports of flour were 131,898 bbls; of wheat none. At that rate it will take a long time to export our 80,000,000 bushel surplus.

These are not pleasant figures for Farm, Stock and Home to contemplate; it would be a deal more gratifying if prospects for higher priced wheat in the future could be be seen; but however unpleasant it may be to contemplate the truth, both wisdom and safety bid us do it. But we must not allow the contemplation to appall or discourage, for there is nothing in the situation to justify it. Throughout a vast extent of territory in the northwest wheat will be grown profitably, with anything like a favorable season, but we believe that the measure of profit will depend more on the yield per acre than on high prices. Lands that are in good condition for wheat, that are or will be properly prepared and planted will, providence favoring, make a profitable return for the labor expended upon them; but we do not believe that there is sufficient basis for high prices in the future to alone justify the taking of large, unbusinesslike chances, for careless cultivation, nor the building of great expectations. In other words, grow wheat as if lower prices were expected, and no mistake will be made, nor will the pangs of unavailing regrets be felt.

"Communism of Capital."

Farm, Stock and Home.

A dispatch from Springfield announced yesterday, says the Chicago News, that a secret meeting of the great "soft-coal trust" of the northwest had been held to discuss the question of output and devise means of maintaining prices in the northwest. The central Illinois operators entered the pool by agreeing for a secret consideration not to enter into competition with the northern association in Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Dakota or Montana. It was decided by both associations to maintain a uniform price throughout the west and northwest for the entire output, the price to be regulated monthly during the season of greatest consumption.

At the same time a United States senator was commenting in the senate chamber upon the closing of the Montana copper mines by order of the copper syndicate, throwing out of employment 2,500 men in the middle of winter. He also referred to the sugar trust, and said that these commercial devil-fishes were crushing the life out of all legitimate trade and commerce in the United States.

The senator might have multiplied his list almost indefinitely. He might have cited the following from Mr. Stewart's "Statistics of Idleness:" The combined steel industries of the country pay the Vulcan steel works of St. Louis $400,000 to stand idle, thus throwing its workmen out of employ. The Waverly stone ring pays quarries thousands of dollars—in one instance $4,500 a year—to do nothing. The salt works along the Kanawha were bought up by the Americn Salt Manufacturers' association and have never employed a man since. The Standard Oil company buys up competitors and dismantles their works. The tack manufacturers buy out a refactory fellow who would not join the pool, and not a wheel has turned since. The Western Lead and Shot association buys the shot-tower at Dubuque, Iowa, to keep men from working there. The bagging mills at Dixon, Illinois, have been idle for three years, while the proprietor draws a dividend from the pool for "limiting production" greater than he could realize by running his works. Sloan & Co., stop as many coal mines as is necessary to prevent the output from exceeding the limit agreed upon at the "annual meeting" of the combination. So with the cokeovens. The Joliet steel mills suspended "indefinitely" before the late election because "we can just as well as not, and we wish to impress upon our workmen the necessity of maintaining the tariff."

It might be well for some chemist to analyze these communes of capital, and also those of labor and of enforced idleness, just to see if there be any difference in them, save in degree, or if the first are any more justifiable than the last. It would surely take a chemical analysis to tell the difference; ordinary observation and intelligence cannot.

A Great Mistake.

M. Pearce, in Farm, Stock and Home, has the following article on Minnesota as an apple state:

Will Minnesota ever be an apple state, is a question that none can answer. During the last thirty years there have been several periods when the prospect for an abundance of apples in this region was very flattering, and when we all took courage, but soon expectations and trees were all blasted and dead, our labor and thousands of dollars gone. The faith of some weakened, while a large per cent. lost all faith. The most of us know that a great mistake has been made in planting grafted trees unadapted to this climate.

If at the first settlement of the state all had planted seeds of hardy varieties in the place of trees, there are good reasons for believing that long before this time Minnesota would have been blessed with an abundance of good apples. It is now my opinion that the sooner farmers of Minnesota and Dakota resort to planting the seed of hardy apples the sooner they will have hardy trees and plenty of fruit.

My memory carries me back many years to an incident in the early days of the state. I stopped at a farm house where all the orchard trees were dead but one, and that was in a healthy, thrifty condition and well loaded with nice read winter apples. I asked the lady of the house the name of the apple. She said it was a seedling she planted nineteen years before. I procured cions from that and other seedlings found in the county, and they are all now doing well in my experimental orchard.

Some twelve years ago I commenced planting apple seeds on a small scale. The first planting was seed from the Tetofsky, fertilized by the Duchess. From the planting I got one tree that fruited the sixth year from the seed. The fruit was exhibited at King's big fair in Minneapolis and took the first premium of $10 as the best apple on exhibition. This fruit has taken $32 in first premiums at the various large fairs. The wood has never been injured during any of our hard winters. It is a very prolific bearer, fruit of medium size, striped, and of delicious quality; season, from September till November. I also have another apple equally hardy. Fruit large, very prolific; not so highly flavored as the foregoing, but keeps longer. I have many seedlings from selected seed that are doing well, and expect valuable fruit from many of them.

Selecting seed from the hardiest and best apples is of great importance. It is only the smoothest seedlings that are transplanted; the others are grafted. If crab seeds are planted I would take them from cherry crabs that have been fertilized by the Duchess or some other good apple. I have a seedling grown from a cherry crab seed fertilized by the Duchess. The hardiness of the tree, size, color, quality and productiveness have caused us to discard nearly all the other hybrids and plant this in their stead.

In conclusion I would say that I have discarded all the old varieties of apples and crabs, and am planting none but my own seedlings and a few others of like character, as fast as I can grow them. I think I am now on the right track to grow apples in Minnesota.

Wm. Mitchell and wife came in from the east on Tuesday, en route for Louisiana.

Jas. Greenhalgh. Sr., has been suffering from a severe attack of sickness this week.

Chas. Sawyer and wife left Tuesday night for the east where they will visit for a few days.

H. Murray, while at his work at the depot, Monday, had one of his limbs seriously injured.

M. R. Brown went below Tuesday night, to be present at a meeting of the drainage committee.

Charlie Thomas has returned from Dakota, where he has been working at the barber business.

Miss Laura Flanders went up to Warren this week, for a brief visit with Mr. and Mrs. Fred Flanders.

Mrs. C. B. Bruce left for Minneapolis Tuesday night, where she will visit with her daughter, Mrs. Peck.

Miss Hattie Stone left on Tuesday for a two weeks' visit in Minneapolis and various points in Wisconsin.

Ed. Brizland, of Grand Forks, formerly a resident of this city, rejoices over the arrival of a baboy by at his house.

Willie McGrew is learning type setting in his father's office, and is doing remarkably well for a boy twelve years of age.

Ebert Cameron came down from Eastern Polk Tuesday, and started his mother, Mrs. D. Cameron, on her way to Louisiana.

The case of selling liquor to Indians, at Fosston, some time since, was brought before U. S. Commissioner Ives on Monday, but was carried over to the 30th.

The Times was slightly in error last week in regard to the Carman post office regulations. The mail will be delivered at Carman daily, as heretofore.

Jim Fisk, of the firm of Smith, Fisk & Co., Fifth ward, has taken charge of the dry goods department, and Smith & Sullivan will carry on the grocery department in future.

Miss Emma Hathaway is prepared to give lessons in cutting paper flowers or will cut flowers for those who may desire them at reasonable rates. Specimens may be seen at F. E. Hertz & Co's.

An exhibition of careless driving occurred on Broadway Tuesday afternoon in which the shaft of one cutter was driven against the back of another, with terrific force. Fortunately no serious damage was done, but there was much dissatisfaction because of the collision.

Will Goodin, who worked a number of days in Bradley's barber shop, left on the early train a few days ago, taking with him some $10 in cash belonging to Bradley, together with Fred Philips' watch and other articles which he thought would be of service to him. From Crookston he went to the Forks and thence to Fargo where he was last heard from.

Supt. Elliot came into our sanctum Tuesday, and, with a bland smile, deposited upon our table a volume entitled: "Fifth Biennial Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction." Although we have had time for nothing more than a casual glance over its pages, we venture to say it is richly stored with valuable information for all persons interested in the educational interests of the state.

Warren Sheaf: Mr. Israel Lafremboise, of Crookston, commenced the drilling of a well on the Casper Sands farm, at Lower Snake, on Monday, Jan. 7th, at 1:20 o'clock, and on Wednesday, Jan. 9th, at 3 p. m., had drilled 164 feet, sunk a 2-inch pipe and had a well that flowed a barrel of water in two minutes. It is estimated to flow 1,000 barrels daily. Surely the water question is being solved. This is considered first-class work and its value to a farm can hardly be estimated.

Dr. Robertson went up to Kennedy Sunday.

Ernest Childs took a trip to Warren Sunday.

E. D. Childs was in Baltimore, Md., last Sunday.

Woodham, the new furniture man, was on the sick list Monday.

Mr. Crookshanks, of Buffington, was in the city during the early part of the week.

Jim Kernan returned from St. Joseph's last week, and is attending the city school.

Ed. Sheasgreen, with a number of friends, were out for a sleigh ride last Thursday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Creamer and Miss Nellie Mullen start for their home in Cresco, Iowa, this evening.

Johnnie Hart, who for a number of years has been residing in the city, has decided to make Chicago his home for a season.

The M. E. church will begin a series of meetings next Sunday, assisted by Rev. Harrison and Mr. McLauthlin, both from Manitoba.

Rev. J. C. Fortin has been preparing for a grand concert, to take place in Fisher on the 21st of next month. A number of our people are thinking of going over.

Frank LaBryn and Wm. Nourse, of Minneapolis, spent the Sabbath in the city, the guests of Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Hathaway. They were en route to the Pacific coast.

Rev. Chas. Carroll preached in the Congregational church Sunday evening to a large congregation. Meetings for the week were announced to be held at the Congregational church.

Four panes of glass were broken in a house in Sampson's addition, Tuesday evening, by some unknown party, who ran the full length of the house striking the windows with a club, while passing. Better look out, boys!

A number of our young people took a sleigh ride Saturday evening, and astonished the small urchins by the amount of style they exhibited. We believe it is the first time since New Year's that a four-in-hand has appeared on our streets.

Mell Milne received a letter a few days since from R. F. Porter, formerly a successful teacher in the Fifth ward, but now an attorney-at-law in Kansas City. His many friends will wish him abundant success in the profession of his choice, and in preparation for which he worked so faithfully in the Ann Arbor law school.

Early Tuesday morning while the boys of the fire department were still "dreaming the happy hours away," the bell gave forth an alarm of fire, and in their usual prompt style the boys turned out and rushed to the scene of action, which proved to be at John Schaffer's place, corner Broadway and Fourth street, where a hay stack was going up in flames. The boys, who are always ready to attack anything in their line of business, went to work, and soon cheated the flames of their prey. One of the boys was heard to remark that they found the wheeling pretty poor.

Some of our farmers being deceived into thinking that snow storms and blizzards were left out of this year's program, were taken unawares by the recent snow, and were poorly fortified with fuel and groceries. One young bachelor of our acquaintance found himself at the close of the storm with three sticks of wood for fuel and only some cold potatoes and syrup to satisfy the cravings of the inner man. He thinks that while both articles of food mentioned are good in their place, he would hardly choose that combination as a regular diet, and trusts that he will not be called upon to make that his bill of fare in future.

Our reporter called at the oat meal factory, this week, where he was received by Mr. Dobson, who escorted him through the building, showing him the immense amount of machinery and the work accomplished thereby. Those persons who have had no business calling them within its walls, have no idea of the magnitude of the factory or the amount of work done therein. Everywhere were indications of the greatest care being taken to insure cleanliness and good work throughout the mill, and the results of all this care and invested capital are sufficient to satisfy even the most fastidious. Mr. Dobson showed us, with just pride, the condition of the grain as he sends it to the rollers; a careful inspection of the prepared oats failed to bring to light one husk or a foul seed. The mill is being successfully run, night and day, under the careful supervision of either the proprietor or Robert Stanton, and the citizens of Crookston may rest assured that nowhere in the land can a better quality of rolled oats be found than is being produced in their midst by a man whose enterprise and business foresight led him to persevere in this work which, until proven successful, has been met with little encouragement and some ridicule. We have to acknowledge the receipt of samples of the meal produced by the mill, and we know whereof we speak when we pronounce it of a quality not to be excelled. Let us have more such examples of enterprise in other branches of industry, and we shall stand a city of no mean repute in the manufacturing world.

Dr. Just and O. H. Sauke took a trip to the Forks on Tuesday.

R. A. Wilkinson, of St. Paul, was in he city on Sunday.

Charlie Cahoon has been under the weather for a number of days.

Wm. Kelso, cashier of the Hallock bank, was in the city on Sunday.

Ed. Cleary has returned to the city, and has been employed by Barnes & Slocum.

The M. E. church appointed meetings for Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings of this week.

The Minneapolis & Northern Elevator Co. have closed their house at Angus, and called in their buyer, Mr. Lennan.

G. M. Barber left last week for Chicago, where he will reside in future. He has centered his business interests in a barb wire manufactory in that city.

At the regular meeting of the Salmagundi club, the election of officers resulted as follows: President, W. F. Kelso; vice president, Miss Maggie Brown; secretary, John Rogers.

John Sandberg is away, attending "Hope academy," a Scandinavian school at Moorhead. John has proven himself a steady, diligent young man, while attending school in this city, and it is to be hoped that he will do well.

The Warren Sheaf says: T. Wees returned Tuesday from his visit to Ontari He says his visit was cut short by so much rain and bad weather, and he longed to be in Minnesota enjoying our beautiful winter. Beats all don't it?

Norman County Index: In a letter to ye editor Senator Sampson says he will put in his time this winter working for re-apportionment and state aid for drainage. He says he favors "no narrow minded railroad laws," and that "he thinks this country needs more railroads to compete with those we have"

Duluth Herald: A large force of right of way cutters, camp builders and road makers is at work along the line of the Duluth & Winnipeg west of the end of track. The road itself also has several parties of engineers out on both sides of the Mississippi river. As soon as spring opens the full grading forces will be put at work again.

Crookston Times: A. N. Hopkins came up from Duluth Saturday, and has been spending the week in the city, greeting old friends, of whom he has a large number here. Mr. Hopkins, as has been before mentioned in the Times, is a candidate for the office of Chief Weighmaster, at Duluth, with excellent chances of being appointed. He is familiar with the duties of the office, and the desire for his appointment is general throughout the whole valley.

The editor of THE JOURNAL called to see Mr. Manvel on Friday last in relation to the order recently issued removing the engineers and conductors from this city to Grand Forks. Mr. M. said that the division superintendent had had orders to economize in every particular this winter, and, as this would be quite a saving, had ordered the change without consulting the officials at St. Paul. He assured us that in all probability the order would be rescinded in a few days.

A Sad Death.

Grand Forks Herald, Jan. 18.

Last evening, shortly after 7 o'clock, Miss Minnie Secord died at the residence of her father, H. M. Secord, on the east side. The young lady was 18 years of age last August. She was very popular among her young friends and acquaintances and her early demise is greatly regretted. Always of a jovial and kindly disposition she was one of the most friendly young ladies of the city. She was spending the holidays with friends in Minneapolis when she fell while skating and sustained an internal injury that brought on death. She came home on the 8th inst. and was indisposed at the time. Gradually she grew worse until the physicians gave up all hope of her recovery. About a week ago her bright nature seemed to grow clouded and she expressed the thought that she would never recover, saying that the world had grown so wicked she did not care to live. Her death came easy and peacefully she sleeps the sleep that knoweth no awakening. To thus be stricken down while in the full bloom of youth is indeed sad. What adds to the sadness is the fact that her father was away from her side at the time of her death. Monday he received a dispatch telling of the death of his brother in Michigan. He immediately started to attend the funeral, never dreaming that his daughter was in danger of death. When he reached Michigan he found a telegram calling him home at once and he is expected to-morrow. The funeral of Miss Minnie will not be arranged until his arrival.

Those persons who paused to gaze in curiosity upon our reporter as with blanched face and dilating eye, he read a message handed him, on the street, will cease to wonder at the circumstance when aware of the contents of the message, which are given herewith:

CARMAN, Minn., Jan. 21, 1889.

Peter Cornelius visited the State Experimental farm while in St. Paul last week. He is very favorably impressed with what he saw. Says the experiments being made to test the value of our wheat as seed will be worth thousands to the state.

To say that the defeat of D. M. Sabin at the caucus last Thursday was a bitter disappointment to our people would be drawing it mild. Mr. Sabin was the man best calculated, by the very nature of things to subserve our interests, and his defeat was a great disappointment, that even the fact of Mr. Washburn's being a great man cannot assuage entirely.

We refer to farmers to whom we have made loans as to our promptness in dealing with them. Our old customers always recommend their neighbor to us.

On January 18th, Chief of Police Hayes received a telegram from sheriff Downey, at Great Falls, Montana, ordering the arrest of one Dr. Judson C. Brown, charged with grand larceny. Hayes took his man and has held him in Crookston. Monday night, an officer passed through the city en route for St. Paul, where he intended to apply to the Governor for requisition papers. It appears that the Dr. was going east to accept a position in a hospital, and, being short of funds, was tempted to commit the crime with which he is charged.

LATER—Tuesday morning, the police were instructed to release the Doctor, who walked about the city, and was heard to say he would go below that night. Late in the day, instructions were received to hold him until further orders. Sheriff Paulsrud and the entire police force engaged in a search but were unsuccessful. Having kept a vigilant watch of the train before leaving the station, and getting no sight of their man, the officers boarded the train for Carman, where the object of their search was awaiting the train, and—Paulsrud, who took him under his arm and returned to the city, where he will await the will of the law.

Railroad Meeting.

Despite the storm of Wednesday evening Ericsson's hall was well filled with representative business men, who met to consider ways and means to add to the prosperity of ou city. A committee, consisting of R. J. Montague, Wm. Anglim, E. M. Walsh, Geo. Q. Erskine and H. E. Cooke, was selected by the house to ascertain, what, if any, roads could be induced to build into the city next summer, and to draft a bonding bill. Another committee, consisting of Judge Ives, Henry Wight and John McLean, was appointed to correspond with our members in congress, to urge the immediate adoption of means to settle the indemnity land question in which this country is vitally interested. The fact that our people turned out in such numbers on such an evening shows how deeply they are interested in the prosperity of our city.

Signed!

The President has signed Knute Nelson's Red Lake Reservation bill, and now all that remains is to obtain the consent of the Indians when the reservation will be thrown open to settlement. It will require some time to arrange matters, but no doubt the work will be pushed as speedily as possible.

Ex-Senator Steenerson remained in St. Paul to ascertain the outcome of the investigation.

Representative Roberts takes hold of his legislative duties in a manner to inspire great confidence in his abilities. His constituents have every reason to expect an honest and faithful performance of his duties.

Senator Sampson and Representative Roberts worked and voted for Sabin and have the consciousness that, though their labors failed in the caucus they were true to the interests of their constituents confided to their care.

A small package of dynamite exploded in a shed near the residence of John Sheley in Duluth, last week, racking the building seriously, breaking window panes and dishes promiscuously. Mrs. Sheley, who was sick in bed at the time was so frightened that for some time her life was dispaired of and at last accounts she was not out of danger though strong hopes of her recovery were entertained. Mrs. Sheley is known to some of our readers, being the daughter of L. Davis, of Andover. Her many friends here unite with us in the wish for her speedy recovery and will await further news with anxiety.

After Colonel Graves' selection by the republicans for speaker, he said:

"I wish to say that the republican party, in my opinion, while standing upon the threshold of victory, also stands upon the threshold of great opportunity. Let us by direct and conscientious legislation merit the approval of the people." [Applause.]

Fergus Falls Journal: Senator Holmes came to the front Thursday with the first move to provide seed wheat for the Minnesota farmers whose crops were ruined by frost or hail in the northern part of the state. The bill provides for the appropriation of $100,000, to be advanced to the farmers. All applications for relief are to be made prior to March 1st, and they are to be made through town clerks to county auditors. Each applicant is to give a statement of the amount of damage he has suffered and the number of acres he proposes to grow this year. County commissioners will then act as purchasing and distributing agents. The outside allowance to any applicant is $100 worth, and the amount furnished is to be refunded. The obligation to refund this constitutes a first lien on the crop of next year. The farmers who receive the wheat will be required to sign agreements to repay the state, and a copy of these will be filed with the state auditor. There is a provision that each man who receives the wheat shall market enough of his first crop as early as possible after threshing to reimburse the state. The use of the grain for any other purpose than seeding is made punishable by a fine of not less than $10 or ninety days in jail. County commissioners are authorized to issue four years bonds to the state for the fulfillment of the contracts to the full amount of the money used in their respective counties of Wilkin, Otter Tail, Hubbard, Becker, Clay, Norman, Polk, Marshall, Kittson and others in the northern portion of the state. The bill is in accordance with Gov. McGill's message. A special committee is likely to be appointed on the seed grain question, which is regarded as one of the most important subjects of legislation in sight.

EXCURSIONS TO ST. PAUL & MINNEAPOLIS.

Parties desiring to take advantage of these veay low excursion rates, should apply to their nearest St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railway ticket agent for through tickets and general information regarding advantages offered passengers by this great Northwest railway system of Minnesota and Dakota.

STILL FOR SABIN.

The Minnesota Farmers Don't Want Washburn for Senator.

Special to the Globe.

CROOKSTON, Minn., January 18.—The Globe this morning contains the announcement that Hon. W. D. Washburn has been chosen by the republicans of the house and senate to represent our state as senator. How such a choice could have been made by farmer members of the house and senate will ever remain a mystery. On the trains this morning, after the result of the caucus was known throughout the state, much excitement was manifest, as the people do not feel as though their rights had been subserved in this very important matter. Mr. Washburn's interests are not identical with those of the farmers of Northern Minnesota especially, and all hope that the result of the caucus will not be ratified on Tuesday next, when the final vote is cast. The writer is a resident of Northern Minnesota and knows well the sentiment of the people of that section. The farming public have rights that should be respected and interests that should be guarded, and the question is, will the millionaire give them proper recognition should he be their new senator. Northern Minnesota, with few exceptions, has desired the reelection of Mr. Sabin, for the reason that, regardless of all statements to the contrary, his interests have been with the people and for the people. His position has never placed him above the level of common humanity, and he has met adversity with a nerve and honor unparalleled in state politics; and the people still insist on seeing Sabin reelected. Let our representatives and senators represent their constituents in an honorable and fearless manner, and support the farmers' friend and benefactor, D. M. Sabin.

A New Social Reign.

St. Paul Globe: The advent of Gov. Merriam brings with it the promise that society hereafter shall count as one of the factors of the state house. Mrs. Merriam is to hold Friday afternoon receptions, and while another public ball is not on the tapis for some time, there will undoubtedly be many charming select parties in which officials will take a prominent part. * * * The poverty of past governors has been a very good excuse for making their official lives mere rounds of routine. With Gov. and Mrs. Merriam this is not the case, and the semi official announcement that the new official life will be a social one as well must be a pleasing one to every resident of the state.

Norman County Herald: "To every resident of the state." Yes! just so. How all this social hilarity, these "charming select parties" will gladden hearts of the laboring thousands of St. Paul and Minneapolis. What more-than-Fourth-of-July rejoicing will go up from the Red River Valley granger who takes Donnelly's advice and "while the walking is good" goes down to St. Paul to look over the festive scene: How the hardworking sewing woman, the saleslady, and the wife of the laborer will enthuse over these "Friday afternoon receptions." How it will cheer the hearts of the farmer's wife and mitigate the arduous unceasing toil necessary to keep the little family comfortable in patched and darned raiment in a home where a frosted wheat crop has left little to buy new clothing. It is a matter of rejoicing when the state has a governor of wealth who uses his wealth as freely and judiciously as did Gov. Pillsbury during the grass-hopper raids of ten or twelve years ago and as we have every reason to believe Gov. Merriam would if necessary and "every resident of the state" should be pleased to know that we have a governor with big fortune and big heart; a long purse and a long head; that his wife is a lady, who like Mrs. Cleveland, has that kindly and sweet disposition that captivates all who approach her, but it's rather much to ask "every resident of the state" to rejoice over the "charming select parties" that so enthuse the Globe.

A Dishonest Voice.

Moorhead News.

The New York Voice, a so-called moral reform and prohibition paper has published, with a great deal of indignation a story that the National Republican Committee received during the campaign the Voice's mail list from the thief who stole it and paid him for it. If this accusation be true Messrs. Quay, Clarkson and Dudley are bigger gumbs than we thought they were as they had no need to pay anything for the Voice's mail list. All they had to do to get a greater part of the names on it was to purchase a copy of Rowell's newspaper directory. As a specimen of the Voice's circulation, of which they make great boasts, we will state that this office receives regularly four copies of the Voice gratuitously, and addressed to the Daily News, and to Daily and Weekly News, one to Weekly News, and one to G. N. Lamphere. There are 15,555 newspapers and periodicals published in the United States. If each one receives four copies of the Voice as we do, it accounts for 62,220 of its claimed circulation, according to Rowell's newspaper directory for 1888, of over 75,000. A considerable number is received by citizens of Moorhead, but we venture to say that not one of them was ever subscribed for. How did the Voice procure the names of our citizens? Some enthusiast made out a list at the request of the Voice, and mailed it thereto. The Voice cries out against frauds, political and otherwise. There is not another paper in the country, to our knowledge, which perpetrates so bold and barefaced a fraud upon the people or falsifies its circulation, in order to secure advertising and other patronage to the Voice. Out upon such reformers. There is not an honest breath in its body, and perhaps not a sober one.

Fragrance of the Gospel.

One of Dr. Talmage's Most Remarkable Sermon's On Christ as the Savior of Men.

BROOKLYN, Dec. 2.—The Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D., preached an eloquent sermon on "The Fragrance of the Gospel," taking for his text:

"All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."—Psalms lxv., 8. He said.

Among the grand adornments of the city of Paris is the Church of Notre Dame, with its great towers, and elaborate rose-windows, and sculpturing of the last judgment, with the trumpeting angels and rising dead; its battlements of quarterfoil; its sacristy, with ribbed ceiling and statues of saints. But there was nothing in all that building which more vividly appealed to my plain republican tastes, than the costly vestments which laid in oaken presses—robes that had been embroidered with gold, and had been worn by popes and archbishops on great occasions. There was a robe that had been worn by Pius VII. at the crowning of the First Napoleon. There was also a vestment that had been worn at the baptism of Napoleon II. As our guide opened the oaken presses and brought out these vestments of fabulous cost, and lifted them up, the fragrance of the pungent aromatics in which they had been preserved, filled the place with a sweetness that was almost oppressive. Nothing that had been done in stone more vividly impressed me than these things that had been done in cloth, and embroidery, and perfume. But today I open the drawer of this text, and I look upon the kingly robes of Christ, and as I lift them, flashing with eternal jewels, the whole house is filled with the aroma of these garments, which "smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."

In my text the King steps forth. His robes rustle and blaze as He advances. His pomp and power and glory overmaster the spectator. More brilliant is He than Queen Vashti, moving amid that Persian princes; than Marie Antoinette on the day when Louis XVI. put upon her the necklace of 800 diamonds; than Anne Boleyn the day when Henry VIII. welcomed her to his palace: all beauty and all pomp forgotten, while we stand in the presence of this imperial glory, King of Zion, King of earth, King of Heaven, King forever! His garments not worn out, not dust-bedraggled; but radiant, and jeweled, and redolent. It seems as if they must have been pressed a hundred years amid the flowers of heaven. The wardrobes from which they have been taken must have been sweet with clusters of camphire, and frankincense, and all manner of precious wood. Do you not inhale the odors? Ay, ay. They smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces.

Your first curiosity is to know why the robes of Christ are odorous with myrrh. This was a bright-leafed Abyssinian plant. It was trifoliated. The Greeks, Egyptians, Romans and Jews bought and sold it at a high price. The first present that was ever given to Christ was a sprig of myrrh, thrown on His infantile bed in Bethlehem, and the last gift that Christ ever had was myrrh, pressed into the cup of His crucifixion. The natives would take a stone and bruise the tree, and then it would exude a gum that would saturate all the ground beneath. The gum was used for purposes of merchandise. One piece of it, no larger than a chestnut, would whelm a whole room with odors. It was put in closets, in chests, in drawers, in rooms, and its perfume adhered almost interminably to anything that was anywhere near it. So when in my text I read that Christ's garments smell of myrrh, I immediately conclude the exquisite sweetness of Jesus. I know that to many He is only like any historical person; another John Howard; another philanthropic Oberlin; another Confucius; a grand subject for a painting; a heroic theme for a poem: a beautiful form for a statue; but to those who have heard His voice, and felt His pardon, and received His benediction, He is music, and light, and warmth, and thrill, and eternal fragrance. Sweet as a friend sticking to you when all else betray. Lifting you up while others try to push you down. Not so much like morning glories, that bloom only when the sun is coming up, nor like "four o'clocks," that bloom only when the sun is going down, put like myrrh, perpetually aromatic—the same morning, noon and night—yesterday, today, forever. It seems as if we cannot wear Him out. We put on Him all our burdens, and afflict Him with all our griefs, and set Him foremost in all our battles, and yet He is ready to lift, and to sympathize, and to help. We have so imposed upon Him that one would think in eternal affront He would quit our soul; and yet today He addresses us with the same tenderness, dawns upon us with the same smile, pities us with the same compassion. There is no name like His for us. It is more imperial than Cæsar's more musical than Beethoven's, more conquering than Charlemagne's, more eloquent than Cicero's. It throbs with all life. It weeps with all pathos. It groans with all pain. It stoops with all condescension. It breathes with all perfume. Who like Jusus to set a broken bone, to pity a homeless orphan, to nurse a sick man, to take a prodigal son back without any scolding, to illumine a cemetery all ploughed with graves, to make a queen unto God out of the lost woman of the street, to catch the tears of human sorrow in a lachrymatory that shall never be broken? Who has such an eye to see our need, such a lip to kiss away our sorrow, such a hand to snatch us out of the fire, such a foot to trample our enemies, such a heart to embrace all our necessities? I struggle for some metaphor with which to express Him. He is not like the bursting forth of a full orchestra; that is too loud. He is not like the sea when lashed to rage by the tempest; that is too boisterous. He is not like the mountain, its brow wreathed with the lightnings; that is too solitary. Give us a softer type, a gentler comparison. We have seemed to see Him with our eyes and to hear Him with our ears, and to touch Him with our hands. Oh, that today he might appear to some other one of our five senses! Ay, the nostril shall discover His presence. He comes upon us like spice gales from heaven. Yea, His garments smell of pungent, lasting, and all-persuasive myrrh.

Oh, that you all knew His sweetness. How soon you would turn from your novels. If the philosopher leaped out of his bath in a frenzy of joy, and clapped his hands, and rushed through the streets, because he found the solution of a mathematical problem; how will you feel leaping from the fountain of a Savior's mercy and pardon, washed, clean, and made white as snow, when the question has been solved: "How can my soul be saved?" Naked, frost-bitten, storm-lashed soul, let Jesus this hour throw around thee the "garments that smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."

Your second curiosity is to know why the robes of Jesus are odorous with aloes. There is some difference of opinion about where these aloes grow, what is the color of the flower, what is the particular appearance of the herb. Suffice it for you and me to know that aloes mean bitterness the world over, and when Christ comes with garments bearing that particular odor, they suggest to me the bitterness of a Saviour's sufferings. Were there ever such nights as Jesus lived through—nights on the mountains, nights on the sea, nights in the desert? Who ever had such a hard reception as Jesus had? A hostelry the first, an unjust trial in over and terminer another, a foul mouthed and yelling mob the last. Was there a space on his back as wide as your two fingers where he was not whipped? Was there a space on His brow an inch square where he was not cut of the briers? When the spike struck at the instep, did it not go clear through to the hollow of the foot? Oh, long, deep, bitter pilgrimage. Aloes! Aloes!

John leaned his head on Christ, but who did Christ lean on? Five thousand men fed by the Savior; who fed Jesus? The sympathy of a Saviour's heart going out to the leper and the adulteress; but who soothed Christ? Denied both cradle and death bed. He had a fit place for neither to be born nor to die. A poor babe! A por lad! A poor young man! Not so much as a taper to cheer his dying hours. Even the candle of the sun snuffed out. Oh, was it not all aloes? All our sins, sorrows, bereavements, losses and all the agonies of earth and hell picked up as one cluster and squeezed into one cup, and that pressed to His lips until the acid, nauseating, bitter draught was swallowed with a distorted countenance, and a shudder from head to foot, and a gurgling strangulation. Aloes! Aloes! Nothing but aloes. All this for Himself? All this to get fame in the world of being a martyr? All this in a spirit of stubbornness, because He did not like Cæsar? No! no! All this because He wanted to pluck you and me from hell. Because He wanted to raise you and me to heaven. Because we were lost and He wanted us found. Because we were blind and He wanted us to see. Because we were serfs and He wanted us manumitted. Oh, ye in whose cup of life the saccharine has predominated; oh, ye who have had bright and sparkling beverages, how do you feel toward Him who in your stead, and, to purchase your disenthrallment, took the aloes, the unsavory aloes, the bitter aloes?

Your third curiosity is to know why these garments of Christ are odorous with cassia. This was a plant which grew in India and the adjoining islands. You do not care to hear what kind of flower it had or what kind of a stalk. It is enough for me to tell you that it was used medicinally. In that land and in that age, where they knew but little about pharmacy, cassia was used to arrest many forms of disease. So when in my text we find Christ coming with garments that smell of cassia, it suggests to me the healing and curative power of the Son of God. "Oh," you say, "now you have a superfluous idea. We are not sick. Why do we want cassia? We are athletic. Our respiration is perfect. Our limbs are lithe, and in these cool days we feel we could bound like the roe." I beg to differ, my brother, from you. None of you can be better in physical health than I am, and yet I must say we are all sick. I have taken the diagnosis of your case, and have examined all the best authorities on the subject, and I have come now to tell you that you are full of wounds and bruises and putrefying sores which have not been bound up or mollified with ointment. The marasmus of sin is on us—the palsy, the dropsy, the leprosy. The man that is expiring to-night on Fulton street—the allopathic and homeopathic doctors having him up, and his friends now standing around to take his last words—is no more certainly dying as to his body than you and I are dying, unless we have taken the medicine from God's apothecary. All the leaves of this Bible are only so many prescriptions from the divine physician, written, not in Latin, like the prescriptions of earthly physicians, but in plain English, so that a man, though a fool, need not err therein. Thank God that the Saviour's garments smell of cassia.

Suppose a man were sick, and there was a phial on his mantel-piece with medicine he knew would cure him, and he refused to take it, what would you say of him? He is a suicide. And what do you say of that man who, sick in sin, has the healing medicine of God's grace offered to him, and refuses to take it? If he dies he is a suicide. People talk as though God took a man and led him out to darkness and death, as though He brought him up to the cliffs and then pushed him off. Oh, no. When a man is lost it is not because God pushes him off; it is because he jumps off. In olden times a suicide was buried at the cross-roads, and the people were accustomed to throw stones upon his grave. So it seems to me there may be in this house a man who is destroying his own soul, and as though the angels of God were here to bury him at the point where the roads of life and death cross each other, throwing upon the grave the broken law and a great pile of misimproved privileges, so that those going may look at the fearful mound and learn what a suicide it is when an immortal soul, for which Jesus died, puts itself out of the way.

When Christ trod this planet with foot of flesh, the people rushed after him—people who were sick, and those who, being so sick they could not walk, were brought by their friends. Here I see a mother holding up her little child and saying: "Cure this croup, Lord Jesus. Cure this scarlet fever." And others saying: "Cure this ophthalmia. Give ease and rest to this spinal distress. Straighten this club foot." Christ made every house where He stopped a dispensary. I do not believe that in the 19 centuries that have gone by since, His heart has got hard. I feel that we can come now with all our wounds of soul and get His benediction. O Jesus, here we are. We want healing. We want sight. We want health. We want life. The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick. Blessed be God that Jesus Christ comes through this assemblage now. His "garments smelling of myrrh"—that means fragrance—"and aloes"—they mean bitter sacrificial memories—"and cassia"—that means medicine and cure; and according to my text, He comes "out of the ivory palaces."

You know, of if you do not know I will tell you now, that some of the places of olden time were adorned with ivory. Ahab and Solomon had their homes furnished with it. The tusks of African and Asiatic elephants were twisted into all manners of shapes, and there were stairs of ivory, and chairs of ivory, and tables of ivory, and floors of ivory, and pillars of ivory, and windows of ivory, and fountains that dropped into basins of ivory, and rooms that had ceilings of ivory. Oh white and overmastering beauty. Green tree-branches sweeping the curbs. Tapestry trailing the snowy floors. Brackets of light flashing on the lustrous surroundings. Silvery music rippling to the beach of the arches. The mere thought of it almost stuns my brain, and you say: "Oh, if I could only have walked over such floors! If I could have thrown myself in such a chair! If I could have heard the drip and dash of those fountains?" You shall have something better than that if you only let Christ introduce you. From that place He came, and to that place He proposes to transport you, for His "garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."

Oh, what a place heaven must be! The Tuileries of the French, the Windsor Castle of the English, the Spanish Alhambra, the Russian Kremlin, dungeons compared with it! Not so many castles on either side the Rhine as on both sides of the river of God, the ivory palaces! One for the angels, insuffererably bright, winged, fire-eyed, tempest-charioted; one for the martyrs, with blood-red robes, from under the altar; one for the King, the steps of His palace the crowns of the church militant; one for the singers, who lead the one hundred and forty and four thousand; one for you ransomed from sin; one for me, plucked from the burning. Oh the ivory palaces!

Today it seems as if the windows of those palaces were illumined for some great victory, and I look and see climbing the stairs of ivory, and looking from the windows of ivory, some whom we knew and loved on earth. Yes, I know them. There are father and mother, not 82 years and 79 years as when they left us, but blith and young as when on their marriage day. And there are brothers and sisters, merrier than when we used to romp across the meadows together. The cough gone. The cancer cured. The erysipelas healed. The heart-break over. Oh, how fair they are in the ivory palaces! And your dear little children that went out from you—Christ did not let one of them drop as He lifted them. He did not wrench one of them from you. No. They went as from one they loved well to one whom they loved better. If I should take your little child and press its soft face against my rough cheek, I might keep it a little while; but when you, the mother, came along, it would struggle to go with you. And so you stood holding your dying child when Jesus passed by in the room, and the little one sprang out to greet Him. That is all. Your Christian dead did not go down into the dust and the gravel and the mud. Though it rained all that funeral day, and the water came up the wheel's hub as you drove out to the cemetery, it made no difference to them, for they stepped from the home here to the home there, right into the ivory palaces. All is well with them. All is well.

It is not a dead weight that you lift when you carry a Christian out. Jesus makes the bed up soft with velvet promises, and He says: "Put her down here very gently. Put that head, which will never ache again, on this pillow of hallelujahs. Send up word that the procession is coming. Ring the bells. Ring? Open your gates, ye ivory palaces!" And so your loved ones are there. They are just as certainly there, having died in Christ, as you are here. There is only one thing in heaven they have not got. They want it. What is it? Your company. But, oh, my brother, unless you change your tack you cannot reach that harbor. You might as well take the Baltimore & Ohio railroad, expecting in that direction to reach Toronto, as to go on in the way some of you are going and yet expect to reach the ivory palaces. Your loved ones are looking out of the windows of heaven now, and yet you seem to turn your back upon them. You do not seem to know the sound of their voices as well as you used to, or to be moved by the sight of their dear faces. Call louder, ye departed ones. Call louder from the ivory palaces. When I think of that place, and think of my entering it, I feel awkward I feel as sometimes when I have been exposed to the weather, and my shoes have been bemired, and my coat is soiled, and my hair is disheveled, and I stop in front of some fine residence where I have an errand. I feel not fit to go in as I am and sit among polished guests. So some of us feel about heaven. We need to be washed—we need to be rehabilitated before we go into the ivory palaces. Eternal God, let the surges of Thy pardoning mercy roll over us. I want not only to wash my hands and my feet, but, like some skilled diver standing on the pierhead, who leaps into the wave and comes up at a far-distant point from where he went in, so I want to come up. O Jesus, wash me in the waves of Thy salvation.

And here I ask you to solve a mystery that has been oppressing me for 30 years. I have asked it of doctors of divinity who have been studying theology half a century, and they have given me no satisfactory answer. I turned over all the books in my library, but got no solution to the question, and today I come and ask you for an explanation. By what logic was Christ induced to exchange the ivory palaces of heaven for the crucifixion agonies of earth? I shall take the first 1,000,000,000 years in heaven to study out that problem. Meanwhile and now, taking it as the tenderest and mightiest of all facts that Christ did come, that He came with spikes in His feet, came with thorns in His brow, came with spears in His heart, to save you and to save me. "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." O, Christ, whelm this audience with Thy compassion. Mow them down like summer grain with the harvesting sickle of Thy grace. Ride through to-day the conqueror, Thy garments smelling "of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."

O, sinner, fling everything else away and take Christ! Take Him now, not tomorrow. During the night following this very day there may be an excitement in your dwelling, and a tremulous pouring out of drops from an unsteady and affrighted hand, and before tomorrow morning your chance may be gone.

The Growth of Jerusalem.

The Neuseten Nachrichten aus dem Morgenland, a German newspaper published in Palestine, states the city of Jerusalem is growing in size and populatian at a remarkable rate. Its growth is all the more surprising because neither its situation nor its trade is favorable to a rapid increase; it lies among a not very fertile group of mountains; it has next to no commerce, and has no manufactures. Nevertheless, new buildings are rising daily; churches gardens and institutions of various kinds are filling up the formerly desolate neighborhood to the distance of half an hour's walk beyond the old limits of the city. The Jews are to the front as builders. Their houses spring out of the ground like mushrooms, uniform, ugly, one storied, plentifully supplied with windows, but with no manner of adornment. The Rothschilds havs completed a new hospital. Close beside it there is a new Abyssinian church. The Russians are also great builders. They have erected a new church, consulate, lodging houses for Pilgrims of the orthodox national churches and a hospital. Near to the Russian group stands the "German House," for German Roman Catholics, from whose top the German and the papal flag float side by side. The Russians have also built a high tower upon the Mount of Olives, from whose summit the Mediterranean and the Dead sea can both be seen. The Greeks and Americans are also busy builders, but they provide for the bodily rather than the religious demands of the pilgrims. The former build cafes and bazars and the latter set up shops.

Hawk and Weasel.

Not long ago a hawk attempted to carry off a good sized kitten in its talons, but after carrying her up some distance, and feeling her sharp claws, was glad enough to let her fall which she did without injury to herself. In the following incident the hawk made a worse mistake in selecting its prey.

Mr. Bennett, of Bennett's Mills, N. J., saw a large hen hawk make a rapid descent in a meadow near his home. A moment later he heard a sharp cry, and saw the hawk slowly rise. The ascent was apparently very difficult for the hawk.

Mr. Bennett saw that it had a dark object in its talons, which he supposed to be a rabbit. He watched the hawk closely, and when it had reached an altitude of perhaps one hundred feet, it gave a shrill cry, and fell heavily to the ground. He went to the spot where the hawk fell, and was surprised to find it dead; but he was more surprised to find in a death-grip in its talons a lifeless weasel.

Upon examining the hawk, Mr. Bennett found an ugly rent in its throat, which had evidently been made by the weasel's teeth, and which caused its death.

With much difficulty he removed the weasel from the talons of the hawk. The claws were sunk to their full depth in the sides of the animal, and one had doubtless penetrated its heart. The hawk was one of the largest ever seen in the locality.

Where Soda Comes From.

Along the Peruvian coast, stretching for hundreds of miles, are the famous beds of nitre of soda, which purified is saltpetre. These deposits, more profitable than silver or guano, were discovered accidentally by a vagrant Englishman named George Smith, but were not operated to any extent until recent years. Now, nitrate, having been found a valuable component of a hundred chemical forms, is in demand the world over, and millions of dollars' worth is shipped from the ports along the coast annually.

Before a value was fully known, a number of far-sighted men located "claims" after the fashion in vogue in mining camps everywhere, and then the government stepped in and forbade any further pre-emption. But the original locations cover enough of the deposit to supply the market a century or two, and to keep up the prices they have formed a pool, a monopoly combined, under which they charge from $2 to $3 per hundredweight for what costs them about fifteen cents. There is apparently no limit to the stuff, the bed stretching up and down the coast for 300 or 400 miles.—Price Current, Cincinnati.

A stabbing affray occurred at Granite, Montana, in which a discharged signal man in the Bimetallic mine stabbed Foreman Banks in the left side, making a dangerous wound, at first thought fatal, but Banks still lives and recovery is probable. The assailant is under arrest. Gambling was the cause of one man knifing another at Rumsey, a mining camp near Phillipsburg in a most shocking manner. The victim is in the Alles hospital at Phillipsburg, where he was brought for treatment. It is thought he will recover.

RATTLESNAKE POISON.

The Search for an Antidote Rewarded by Only Partial Success.

The statement that thirty or forty thousand reptils are kept in one room at the Smithsonian sends chills down the backs of nervous people. So many snakes, lizards and toads let loose on the smooth lawn of the park would cause some excitement. However, only five of all these reptils have any life in them. These five are five rattlers, who are kept in a deep box with a wire top, and a vigorous poking and punching with a stick starts the music in their tails. When the five are sounding their rattles together they fill the box with nerve-shocking sound. The other thirty-nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-five, or forty thousand, minus five (as the exact number may be), are securely corked in glass jars in alcohol and arranged on shelves like cans of preserves. The curator of reptiles, who is experimenting in search of antidote for the poison of a reptile's bite, told a Washington Star reporter that it was not true that they had yet discovered any thing that they knew certainly to be an antidote. Far from having satisfactorily concluded their experiments, they consider that they have practially just begun. They have tried every alleged antidote that has been suggested with the least probability of success, and the only thing they have found that has succeeded in any degree is the fluid extract jaborandi, which is made from the South American plant Pilocarpus penatifolius. The active alkaloid of this is Pilocarpine. This has proven to be an antidote in the cases of rabbits subjected to the rattlesnake poison. Where the snake poison has been injected into the rabbit, followed at once or within a short time by an injection of the drug, the animal has recovered. But it has been found to possess no efficacy as an antidote in the case of a chicken poisoned by the venom of the rattler. A very full application of the drug has never yet resulted in saving the chicken's life. They intend to try it on turkeys and pigs.

The story that one of the assailants had been bitten by a rattler and that "antidote" had been applied with success the curator pronounced utterly false. He says that no one has been bitten by the reptiles; that as a fact they are in such a sluggish state it is difficult to get them to strike at any thing. The only information he has of jaborandi having been used successfully to counteract the effects of a snake bite comes from a physician of France, who administered internally a draught of tea made from the plant to a girl who was bitten by a viper, and she recovered from the poison.

A Poor Show.

A man's best friends are not always those in his own household. Jake Bolybug is in reduced circumstances. He is likewise in bad health. His clothes are in such a sad condition that he has often been taken for a member of the press. Jake Bolybug used to go to school with Samuel Sandley, who is known to be exceedingly economical. Jake called on Sam the other day, and begged him for a quarter of a dollar, not as a subsidy, but merely as a loan.

"I have not got any money for you," was the response.

"I'll pay you, Sam, before very long."

"I've got no money, I tell you. It takes every cent I've got to support my poor old mother, my bed-ridden grandfather," and the voice of the supposed hard-hearted man grew husky, and a pearly tear trickled down his unaccustomed cheek, so to speak.

But, Sam, I happen to know that you make your old mother chop wood, and you don't contribute a cent to your bed-ridden grandfather, for you had him cartered over the hill to the poor house, so neither of them cost you a cent.

"You know that, do you?"

"I do."

"Well, if that's the way I do to those who are nearest and dearest to me what chance do you suppose you have of squeezing a quarter, when you are not even a brother to me—eh?" replied Sam as his chin quivered like thirty-five cents worth of calf's foot jelly.—Texas Siftings.

What Affects Real Estate Values.

The price nominally paid for real estate in New York is by no means a sure guide to its actual worth. This is contingent upon locality, improvements and residential or commercial advantages. It depends greatly upon adventitious circumstances, which the intending purchaser should judiciously consider upon the spot. Unlike the securities manipulated at the stock exchange, or the merchandise handled by the produce exchange, it has no temporarily fixed or quotable value. In the judgments of dealers it is worth what the owner or broker can sell it for. Sunshine and shadow are factors of value. Property on the west side of the avenues and on the south side of cross streets is worth on the average about 25 per cent. more than similar property on the opposite side, because it is shaded in the afternoons, when women are wont to make their purchases. The northerly side of streets and the easterly side of avenues are for that reason and for lower rentals preferred for domiciles.—Harper's Magazine.

Sheridan and the Women Soldiers.

During the early part of 1863 the Gen. Sheridan division was quietly settled in quarters in its camp south of Murfreesboro. While there he witnessed this curious incident:

"Col. Conrad, of the Fifteenth Missouri, informed me that he got through without much difficulty; in fact, that everything had gone all right and been eminently satisfactory, except that in returning he had been mortified by the conduct of the two females belonging to the detachment and division train at my headquarters. These women, he said, had given much annoyance by getting drunk, and to some extent demoralizing his men. To say that I was astonished at his statement would be a mild way of putting it, and had I not known him to be a most upright man and of sound sense, I should have doubted not only his veracity, but his sanity. Inquiring who they were and for further details, I was informed that there certainly were in the command two females that in some mysterious manner had attached themselves to the service as soldiers; that one, an East Tennessee woman, was a teamster in the division wagon train, and the other a private soldier in a cavalry company temporarily attached to my headquarters for escort duty. While out on the foraging expedition these Amazons had secured a supply of 'apple-jack' by some means, got very drunk, and on the return had fallen into Stone river and been nearly drowned. After they had been fished from the water, in the process of resuscitation their sex was disclosed, though up to this time it appeared to be known only to each other. The story was straight and the circumstances clear, so convinced of Conrad's continued sanity, I directed the provost marshal to bring in arrest to my headquarters the two disturbers of Conrad's peace of mind. After some little search the East Tennessee woman was found in camp, somewhat the worse for the experience of the day before, but awaiting her fate contentedly smoking a cob pipe. She was brought to me and put in duress under charge of the division surgeon until her companion should be secured. To the doctor she related that the year before she had 'refugeed' from East Tennessee, and on arriving at Louisville she had assumed man's apparel and sought and obtained employment as a teamster in the quartermaster's department. Her features were so large, and so coarse and masculine was her general appearance that she would readily have passed as a man, and in her case the deception was no doubt easily practiced. Next day the 'she dragon' was caught and proved to be a rather prepossessing young woman, and though necessarily bronzed and hardened by exposure, I doubt if, even with these marks of campaigning, she could have deceived as did her companion. How the two got acquainted I never learned, and, though they joined the army independently of each other, yet an intimacy had sprung up between them long before the mishaps of the foraging expedition. They both were forwarded to army headquarters, and, when provided with clothing suitable to their sex, sent back to Nashville, and thence beyond our lines to Louisville."—Sheridan's Personal Memoirs.

The Pump was Out of Order.

"Beg pardon, sir," he said as he stopped a citizen on Michigan avenue, "but does this avenue lead to Dearborn?"

"It does."

"And to the poor-house?"

"Yes."

"Thanks. I am on my way to that institution."

"Yes."

"Got to go out there as a pauper."

"Yes."

"I shall probably die out there as my spirit is broken and my ambition gone."

"Very likely, but they have a nice cemetery there."

"If I had a dollar I think I could keep myself until I found work, and would not be obliged to go," continued the man.

"But you haven't the dollar?"

"No, nor even a penny."

"I thought not. Just keep right on walking and you'll get out there by night. Very nice place. Part of it is an insane asylum, and then there's the cemetery I spoke of. Good day."

The citizen walked on, and the other shuffled around a corner, where a companion in waiting asked:

"Well, did he play?"

"Yes."

"How much?"

"Played me for a fool. We'd better try some other dodge. This is no crowd for sympathy."—Detroit Free Press.

An Essay on Flowers.

A friend of mine who teaches the young idea how to shoot has sent me the following school composition on "Flowers." The author's father is a prominent newspaper man, and it is evident even at his early day that his son is destined to walk in his footsteps:

"Flowers grow every wher exheep in the dezzert.

"Flowers grow in the spring.

"Flowers are good foure hunny.

HE DANCED AT HER WEDDING.

I danced at her wedding last night,
And none could have guessed my emotion
As I saw her a bride—her on whom
I had lavished a lifetime's devotion.
I danced at her wedding. Why not?
Having lived through the scene at the altar,
When the knot was tied fast for all time.
Do you think that my courage would falter?

I danced with as lightsome a step,
With a face as unmoved as the next one;
He must be a fatuous fool
Who in crisis like this could expect one,
Though a tumult were raging within,
To betray to onlookers his passion;
I don't wear my heart on my sleeve—
That sort of thing isn't my fashion.

I danced—so did she. Though I'll swear,
For a fact, that I hardly knew whether
I stood on my heels or my head
When we went wildly whirling together,
When her breath was as sweet on my cheek
As the blossoms of orange she carried,
We danced till folks said 'twas bad tast,e
Since I was the fellow she married!

The Mysterious Organist.

A Legend of the Rhine.

"Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood."

Years ago, at a grand cathedral overlooking the Rhine, there appeared a mysterious organist. The great composer who played the organ so long, suddenly died, and everybody from the King to the peasant, was wondering who could be found to fill his place, when, one bright Sabbath morning, as the sexton entered the church, he saw a stranger seated at the crape-shrouded organ. He was a tall, graceful man, with a pale but strikingly handsome countenance, great, black, melancholy eyes, and hair like a raven's wing in gloss and color. He had not seemed to notice the sexton, but went on playing, and such music as he drew from the instrument no words of mine can describe. The astonished listeners declared that the organ seemed to have grown human that it wailed, and sighed and clamored, as if a tortured human heart was throbbing through it. When the music at length ceased the sexton hastened to the stranger and said:

"Pray, who are you, sir?"

"Do not ask my name," he replied. "I have heard that you are in want of an organist, and have come here on trial."

"You'll be sure to get the place," exclaimed the sexton. "Why you surpass him that's dead and gone, sir."

"No, no, you overrate me," resumed the stranger, with a sad smile; and then, as if disinclined to conversation, he turned from old Hans, and began to play again. And now the music changed from a sorrowful strain to a grand old pean, and the mysterious organist.

"Looking upward full of grace,
Played, till from a happy place
God's glory struck him in the face."

and his countenance seemed not unlike that of St. Michael, as portrayed by Guido.

Lost in the harmonies which swelled around him, he sat with his far seeing gaze fixed on the distant sky, a glimpse of which he caught through an upper window, when there was a stir around the church door, and a royal party came sweeping in. Among them might be seen a young girl, with a wreath of golden hair, eyes of violet hue, and lips like cherries. This was princess Elizabeth and all eyes turned toward her as she seated herself in the velvet cushioned pew appropriated to the court. The mysteries organist fixed his eyes on her and went on playing. No sooner had the music reached her ears, than she started as if a ghost had crossed her path. The bloom faded from her cheeks, her lips quivered, and her whole frame grew tremulous. At last her eyes met those of the organist in a long, yearning look, and then the melody lost its joyous notes, and once more wailed and sighed and clamored.

"By my faith," whispered the King to his daughter, "this organist has a master hand. Hark ye, my child, he shall play at your wedding."

The pale lips of the princess parted, but she could not speak—she was dumb with grief. Like one in a painful dream she saw the pale man at the organ, and heard the melody which filled the vast edifice. Ay, full well she knew who he was, and why the instrument seemed breathing out the agony of a tortured heart.

When the service was over, and the royal party had left the cathedral, he stole away as mysteriously as he came. He was not seen again by the sexton till the vesper hour, and then he appeared in the loft and commenced his task. While he played, a veiled figure glided in and knelt, at a side shrine. There she remained till the worshippers disappeared, when the sexton touched her on the shoulder and said:

"Madam, everybody has gone but you and me, and I wish to close the doors."

The sexton drew into a shady niche, and watched and listened.

The mysterious organist still kept his post, but he could not see the lone devotee. At length she rose from the aisle, and moving to the organ loft, paused beside the musician.

"Bertram," she murmured.

Quick as thought the organist raised his head. There with the light of a lamp suspended to the arch above falling upon her, stood the princess who had graced the royal pew that day. The court dress of velvet, with its soft ermine trimmings the tiara, the necklace, the bracelets, had all been exchanged for a simple grey serge robe and a long thick veil, which was now pushed back from her girlish face.

"Oh! Elizabeth, Elizabeth!" exclaimed the organist, and he sank at her feet and gazed wistfully into her troubled eyes.

"Why are you here, Bertram?" asked the princess.

I came to bid you farewell, and as I dared not venture into the palace, I gained access to the cathedral, and having taken the vacant seat of the dead organist, let my music breathe out the adieu I could not trust my lips to utter."

A low moan was the only answer, and he continued:

"You are married on the morrow?"

"Yes," sobbed the girl. "Oh, Bertram, what a trial it will be to stand at yonder altar, and take upon me the vows that will doom me to a living death."

"Think of me," rejoined the organist. "Your royal father requests me to play at your wedding, and I have promised to be here. If I were your equal I could be the bridegroom instead of the organist; but a poor musician must give you up."

"It is rending body and soul asunder to part with you," said the girl. "To-night I may tell you this—tell how much I loved you, but in a few hours it will be always a sin. Go, go, and God bless you.

She waved him from her as if she would banish him while she had the power to do so, and he—how was it with him. He rose to leave her, then came back, held her to his heart in a long embrace, and with a half-smothered farewell left her.

The next morning dawned in cloudless splendor, and at an earlier hour, the cathedral was thrown open, and the sexton began to prepare for the brilliant wedding. Flame colored flowers nodded by the wayside, from the trees, and lay in light heaps upon the ground, and the ripe wheat waved like a golden sea, and berries dropped in red an purple clusters over rocks along the Rhine.

At length the palace gates were opened, and the royal party appeared, escorting the Princess Elizabeth to the cathedral where the marriage was solemnized. It was a brave pageant; far brighter than the untwined blossoms and foilage were the tufts of plumes which floated from stately heads, and festal robes that streamed over the housings of superb steeds. But the Princess, mounted on a snow white palfrey and clad in snow white velvet, looked pale and sad; and when on nearing the church, she heard a gush of organ music, which, though jubliant in sound, struck on her ear like a funeral knell, she trembled and would have fallen to the ground had not a page supported her. A few more moments afterward, she entered the cathedral. There, with his retinue, stood the royal bridegroom, whom she had never before seen. But her eyes roved from him to the organ loft, where she expected to see the mysterious organist. He was gone, and she was obliged to return the graceful bow of the king to whom she was betrothed from motives of policy. Mechanically she knelt at the altar—mechanically listened to the services and made the responses. Then her husband drew her to him in a convulsive embrace, and whispered:

"Elizabeth! my queen! look up!"

Trembling in every limb, she obeyed. Why did those dark eyes thrill her so? Why did that smile bring a glow to her cheek? Ah, though the king wore the royal purple, and many a jeweled order glittered on his breast, he seemed the same humble person who had been employed to teach her organ music, and had taught her the lore of love.

"Elizabeth," murmured the monarch, "Bertram Hoffman the organist, and King Oscar are one. Forgive my stratagem. I wished to marry you, but I would not drag you to the altar an unwilling bride. Your father was in the secret."

While tears of joy rained from her eyes, the new made queen returned her husband's fond kiss, and for once two hearts were made happy by a royal marriage.

Perhaps He Ment "C. O. D."

From the Albany Argus.

An "up north" clergyman, who is quite well-known in clerical circles in this city, was recently annoyed at the delay of a New York firm in shipping some stained glass windows for his church so he hied himself to the telegraph office and indited and had wired the following terse and axpressive telegram:

"To———, New York.
Send those windows p. d. q. ———"

The windows came in short order, but imagine the consternation of the clergyman and the horror of some of his church members when a "leaky vessel" in the form of a messenger boy, who had glanced at the original message, found that he could not keep the secret and told it to another youth, who directly repeated it to his mother—and then it was the subject of street talk. Some of the good people of the town are still wondering how the pastor came to be so familiar in his quotations with the peculiar abbreviations of Col. Bardwell Sloate, the "members from the Cohosh deestrick."

An English clergyman and his clerk once called on an old Quaker, who was under no obligation to the church, of course, for an Easter offering. He politely asked them in to dinner, and they accepted the invitation. After dinner he set forth in the house brewed ale and then provided pipes for a smoke. The clergyman and his clerk enjoyed the dinner hugely, but as they rose to go the former ventured to ask his entertainer again for the Easter offering. "Friend," replied the old Quaker with a solemn twinkle in his eye, "I have given thee a meat offering, a drink offering and a burnt offering. Dost thou tempt me also to give a heave offering?"

Finding a "Lost Dog."

Every day you see one or more "lost dog" advertisements in the newspapers. If owners didn't love their dogs they wouldn't go to the expense of advertising for them. Most of these dogs have been stolen. The thief sells them to somebody else. Then his "pal" goes to the rightful owner and obtains a handsome reward for recovering the animal. Chicago Times.

It must be protected, however, or it will soon be quite extinct.

There was a cotton-picking bee on George Truitt's farm, near La Grange, Ga., the other day, and the pickers came near breaking the record. One man picked 558 pounds, another 567, another 546, and an old negro woman picked 312 pounds, besides milking the cows in the morning and at night. On being told what she had done, the old aunty said: "Well, I dunno what's gittin' in de old nigger. Now, when ole master used to stan' ober me wid a strop I couldn't do dat. The Book-Buyer tells the following story of Mrs. Margaret Deland, the author of "John Ward, Preacher": "She had amused herself by writing poems and destroying them as soon as read, seemingly caring nothing for them or attaching little or no importance to the gift which they revealed. But one day as she was returning from marketing she called upon a friend, and while waiting in the parlor amused herself by writing a poem. The sudden entrance of the friend surprised her in the act, and a moment later, in a playful way, the poem was snatched away from the unthinking author. There on a scrap of coarse, brown wrapping-paper was her poem, 'The Succory,' which was thus barely saved from the ignominious fate of its predecessors."

That model of modern engineering, the Eiffel tower, on the Champs de Mars, Paris, which was expected to be one of the ornaments of next year's Exposition, is said to be, in point of architectural beauty, a dismal failure. A letter from an American in France is pronounced in its condemnation of the great iron structure. The writer says: "I wanted to stay in Paris, but that tower, which is now 800 feet high, worried me out of my plan. It haunts you. You cannot help seeing it, and the more you see it, the crazier you get. I am now 200 miles from Paris, yet the first thing I see when I get up in the morning is that awful tower. It is a terrible bore. When it reaches its full height one will be able to see it, I guess, all over France. I shall then go to Africa."

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Hints for Housekeepers.

Sprinkle cayenne pepper in the resorts of rats, and they will leave the premises.

Vapor baths will clear the skin. Powdered charcoal, taken on first rising in the morning, is good. Sometimes a good medicine for biliousness is the remedy required.

Chloride of lime is an infallible preventative for rats, as they flee from its odor as from a pestilence. It should be thrown down their holes, and spread about wherever they would be likely to come, and should be renewed once a fortnight.

For biliousness squeeze the juice of a lime or small lemon into half a glass of cold water and stir in a little baking soda; drink while it foams. To be taken when rising in the morning. This will also relieve the sick headache, if taken in the beginning.

To remove iron rust or ink spots, moisten the spots, and apply salts of lemon until they disappear, and then rinse well. Salts of lemon are made of equal parts of oxalic acid and tartaric acid. Another way is to moisten with lemon juice, sprinkle well with salt and lay in the sun.

According to Dr. Erasmus Wilson, the great authority on hair, any one who is threatened with baldness, if it has not made too much headway, can check the tendency by rubbing a little mixed vaseline and sulphur on the spot at night and soak it with quinine every morning.

Rather a novelty has been introduced lately in the shape of a noiseless clock for sick-rooms, the invention being coupled with a night-lamp. When the lamp is lighted the necessary diminution takes place by combustion. At other times a mechanical arrangement allows the water to drop in the regular fashion. The fluid escapes at a uniform rate and keeps both the clock and lamp a going.

The appointment of housekeeper at Windsor Castle, which has become vacant through the death of Mrs. Henderson, is one of the best things for women in the English queen's gift, for there is not only an adequate salary, but the housekeeper has excellent apartments in the castle, valuable perquisites and numerous privileges. When the royal personages from abroad visit the queen at Windsor a handsome present to the housekeeper is a matter of course. Emperor Nicholas of Russia gave the housekeeper £1,000 and Emperor Napoleon a couple of splendid diamond bracelets.

To wash knit silk articles dissolve a moderate amount of white castile soap in lukewarm water. Squeeze and press the water through the articles. Rub as little as possible the deepest stains. Rinse thoroughly in clear, cold water. Extract the water by rolling and twisting in a coarse, heavy towel. Stretch into good form, and dry without exposure to the sun. To add lustre, take a soft, dry piece of flannel, and rub in one direction when the article is nearly dry. Never use a hot iron unless the article is folded inside of another thick cloth. A little ox-gall is sometimes used to prevent colors running.

A person who retires to rest four hours after midnight and gets up at 10 A. M. may be strictly regarded as an early "riser." Thus early rising is synonymous, in long life histories, with short sleeping, which means rapid recovery from fatigue, a sign of bodily strength. These scientific facts in nowise contradict the alleged value of early rising as a practice to be cultivated by all persons in good health. It is excellent as a moral discipline and eminently healthy as a matter of fact. Most persons will eat three meals daily. When a man gets up late, those meals will probably follow each other at too short intervals to be wholesome. When he is an early riser it will probably be otherwise. He can enjoy a good breakfast, and by the time for his lunch or midday dinner he will have an honest appetite.—British Medical Journal.

Domestic Economy in Colleges.

In my judgment no institution of learning that is obliged to leave the instruction of pupils in domestic economy to their parents is full abreast the advanced thought of our progressive age or is thoroughly equipped for supplying the practical educational requirements of the Nineteenth Century. I hope to live to see the day when Wellesly and Smith and Vassar and every other college for women in the country will give as thorough a course of instruction in domestic economy as they give in any other branch of education. That day, I venture to predict, is not far distant.—From a Lecture by Mrs. Emma P. Ewing, of Purdue University.

About Tin Coffee Pots.

A worker in tin was asked if tin coffee-pots were healthful to use. He thought pure tin was pure as silver could be, and would wear as long. "They put the tin on Russia iron," said he. "The way it is done is to take a sheet of Russia iron and dip it into tin red hot.

Upon the surface of the tin floats tallow. As the tin is drawn out it passes through this. The tallow cleans the tin and gives it lustre. If it was not for the tallow, the tin would be all full of little bunches. We find our tin greasy when we get it; this comes from the tallow.

This Russia iron is of the same material as a stove body. This is triple coated, sometimes more, with tin. The regular tin is imported, can't make it here. The Yankee tin made here, cooked tin, we call it, is the goods to look out for. Five-cent goods are made from it."

Plants in Pots.

The injunction said to have been laid on the dauphin by one of the Louises of France, applies to house plants: "My son, you must seem to love your people." "But, sire, how shall I seem to love them?" "My son you must love them."

But this tender regard must be wisely directed. For example: It is well understood that plants in pots need water; but they may easily have too much water; which is sure to do harm; but the harm will be much lessened if there is sufficient drainage. The pieces of broken pots in the bottom should never be omitted. Without proper drainage the soil becomes sour, the plants become sour, the plants languish and the leaves become yellowish. The only remedy then is to repot, shaking out as much of the soil as possible from among the roots, and using fresh soil, old, well-rotted manure, and sharp sand, about equal parts, will answer well. After re-potting and watering, the plant should be shaken for a few days.

In a general way, too little water is better than too much. The drooping leaves indicating drouth, are easier remedied than the yellow leaves, the result of having been kept too wet.—National Stockman and Farmer.

Down East Pumpkin Pie.

A family who had migrated to town from way Down East secured my valuable services as "help" one winter my knowledge thereby gained of real old-fashioned cooking has "helped" me since in a hundred ways. We used pumpkins—the real Jack-o-lantern kind—and prepared enough to last several weeks. This will keep well in the modern glass can with frequent scalding in a hot bath. We had to dry it if it "got ahead" of us. We made only one or two pies at a time, as they should be eaten hot from the oven like pudding. Chop the "vegetable" in sections—peel it if you can—and boil all day, stirring often till it is dry and brown. I used to stew it till soft, and then peel it and replace in the kettle to finish. For one large or two small modern pies allow three cooking spoonfuls, heaping, of hot pumpkin, one spoonful of ginger, a little salt, one spoonful of molasses, and one-half cupful of brown, or a little more of crushed maple sugar, one tablespoonful of flour stirred smooth in a little milk. Beat this all together well till light. Add gradually 1½ pints of boiling milk. We couldn't have all the cream or butter we wanted, as it was war time, but the pies will bear all of either you dare to use. Better use plates enough. They are not good if filled too thick, like a squash pie, as they require a brisk baking to make them light—a slow oven ruins them. When they raise up in the middle, they are done. Carrots were sometimes used in the same fashion in that far-away "East-ward."—An Andover, Mass., Lady.

A Marine Battle.

From the San Francisco Examiner.

The whaling bark Josephine has returned from the Japanese sea. While fishing there she had an unusual adventure. During the month of October the vessel, under command of Captain Horace Smith, saw a terrible struggle in the waters not more than 200 yards away. Two boats were manned, one by the first and the other by the third mate. They were launched and made for the scene of the disturbance. An ocean battle was going on. A couple of killers were tearing a humped-back whale to pieces. The water for yards around was crimsoned with blood. It was apparent that two monsters were attacking a whale. The boatmen fired their harpoons and succeeded in sticking both of the monsters. They were captured and towed to the side of the bark.

The whale had been killed, but the carcass was of no use in consequence of the species of the animal and no attempt was made to recover it. Twelve barrels of good oil were got out of the killers and the head of one was brought to this part and presented to William Bendt, of No. 8, Clay Street. It shows a row of large, savage-looking ivories numbering forty-four. They look ghastly and terrible. The fish is so rare that its capture is regarded as quite a triumph. Not one of the crew of the Josephine had ever before seen such a fish.

A Youthful Bear Hunter.

A bear for a long time made a regular visit to the orchard of Sheriff Power, near Coupeville, W. T., and the other day David Morrison, aged twelve, who lives with the Sheriff, started out, gun in hand, to end Mr. Bruin's existence. The rest of the story is thus told by the Tacoma News:

"When he reached the orchard, sure enough the bear was there, as were also two good-sized cubs. The boy, not at all discouraged at the odds, started in to head off the bear, and must have got within a few feet of her before she saw him. As soon as she caught sight of him she sat up and looked him in the eye, and he thought it was a good time to shoot, and did so, putting a charge of buckshot into the bear's throat, killing her; but he did not wait to see her die, but started for the house to tell the news.

Verbal Snares.

Baltimore News.

The popularity of Peter Piper's celebrated peck of pickled peppers will probably never wane as a snare to catch the tongue that would be agile; but that test has formidable rivals. The following short sentences, as their authors maintain, do wonders in baffling the ordinary power of speech:

Gaze on the gay brigade.
The sea ceaseth, and it sufficeth us.
Say, should such a shapely sash shabby stitches show?
Strange strategic statistics.
Give Grimes Jim's gilt gig-whip.
Sarah in a shawl shoveled soft snow softly.

THE FARM.

Agricultural Notes.

It is the same with butter as with all other products, a uniform quality coupled with quantity will always create a market demand.

The creamery system, as we find it in this country, is far from being perfect, and yet it possesses some advantages over the average farm dairy.

Two horses of one kind will do as much work as four horses of another kind, and it ought not to be hard to determine which is the more profitable.

To remove warts from a cow's teats a correspondent of Hoard's Dairyman recommends a mixture of one part of sulphur to three of lard, applied after each milking.

The necessity for every farm owner to understand the special properties of his soils is evident from the fact that, with the great diversity which exists in soils, no single compound can meet the needs of all.

Cattle of all kinds should be provided with shelter, and now is a good time to provide it if not already furnished. It need not always be expensive. Comfort should be the first consideration.

It costs something like $40 a year to maintain a cow, and the profit lies in what she yields above the cost of care and maintenance. From this it follows that even a small increase in the amount of butter very materially affects the value of the individual.

The Rural World believes that the general farmer with 200 acres of land should keep fifty sheep for utility's sake alone. Such men can afford to estimate the value of sheep from the standpoint of meat, fertility, and the the general advantage to the market price of the wool.

The finer the condition of the manure and the more evenly it is spread over the surface the sooner it will be converted into plant food and the better it will nourish the plants. As the fall is an excellent time to haul and spread the manure a little care given the matter of spreading repaid in the spring.

It is convenient and apparently economical to breed animals only eight months old, or even younger. The sow can be marketed when eighteen months old, being kept through only one winter. But immature animals cannot produce offspring as strong and vigorous as the offspring of older animals.

When farm implements are housed for winter they should be painted with crude petroleum mixed with enough coloring matter to give it a substance that will hold it on. If this is done their durability will be greatly increased, and one of the most serious farm expenses be correspondingly lessened.

An observant Maryland farmer, who has been traveling in the West, writes: "I am confirmed in my old opinion that if our farmers would practice the same rigid economy, industry and perseverance here that the emigrant is forced to do in the West, they would be as well or better off financially after a term of years."

There are in many pieces of corn this year an unusual proportion of what are called nubbins. These are imperfect ears, caused by drought just at earing time. It does not pay to husk and put these in the crib. Left on the stalk the cattle will find them next winter, and eat husk, corn and cob with a relish that will go far towards digesting the less palatable morsels.

Winter Rye.

On many farms, says the Ploughman, a few acres of Winter rye might be grown to as good advantage as almost any crop. It requires but little labor, and not much manure, and in most localities the straw will pay the cost, leaving the grain as clear profit. Very few crops draw so little from the land, and very few have so few enemies, or are so certain to produce good crops every year. Growing as it does in autumn and spring it is not affected by summer droughts, and it is gathering in substance from the surrounding atmosphere at a season when other crops use the least; for this reason a crop of rye takes but very little fertilizer from the soil.

A Good Rule for Stables.

The following is one of the rules of a prominent livery stable in this city where horses of many wealthy men are boarded. "No man will be employed who drinks intoxicating drinks. No man must speak loud to any one of the horses, or in the stable where they are. Horses of good blood are nervous, and loud, excited conversation is felt by every horse in the stable that hears it. Excited words addressed to one horse are felt by every other horse that hears them, and keep them all nervous and uneasy. No man may use profane language in the hearing of the horses." If such a rule prevailed in all the livery and many other stables through out the country, the welfare of all concerned would be promoted. Let it be generally adopted.

Making the Dairy Pay.

A well known dairy writer, in one of our exchanges gives the following five rules as being essential in the manufacture of first-class butter:

Set out the milk quickly as possible after milking.

Skim off the cream before the milk gets thick.

Churn before the milk gets sour, i. e., slightly acid.

Wash out the buttermilk with weak brine.

Salt an ounce to the pound and pack in small packages.

If this article was written relating to milk set in open pans, with no modern appliances, and in any place best calculated to keep the milk, without the expense of preparing a place, the rules might work, except in regard to salting. This is too high for modern tastes. Three quarters of an ounce would come nearer the mark. But why advocate the old plan of open setting, when modern appliances have simplified this question, so that the milk of 10 cows can be set in a very small space, where if ice, or water from a spring be not at hand, cold water from the well may surround the utensils for creaming?—Prairie Farmer.

What Causes Baldness.

Speaking of the number of bald heads to be observed in public gatherings, a prominent physician said to a Mail and Express reporter: "I cannot tell you the cause of baldness. The most plausible view among many doctors was that baldness was especially liable to follow the wearing of a tight-fitting hat, the blood vessels being constricted and the scalp deprived of the necessary supply of blood. But this view has been controverted by a fact brought to light about the Parsees of India. The Parsees are compelled to keep the head covered during the day by a hat so tight as to crease the scalp and possibly the skull, and at night they wear a skull-cap; and yet not one of them has been known to be bald. The Orientals say that worry causes the hair to fall, and it may be true in some cases. The general state of health naturally affects the scalp, but the fact remains that no special cause can be given for baldness. It is doubtless congenital, like many other peculiarities, and the best thing a man can do about it is to keep his body clean, take care of his health and let his scalp alone."

Directions for Shipping Poultry.

The following directions for shipping poultry to market are furnished by the well known commission firm of New York, E. & O. Ward:

Poultry should be entirely cold, but not frozen, before being packed. If packed with any of the animal heat in it, it is almost sure to spoil. Slight freezing does not greatly injure the sale, but hard freezing, especially when it produces discoloration, reduces the value 25 to 50 per cent. Boxes containing about 200 pounds are the best packages. Barrels may, however, be used, they are better for chickens and ducks than for turkeys and geese, as the larger kinds get bent and twisted out of shape in them. For packing, use only very clean, dry and threshed wheat or rye straw in the bottom of the package, then alternate layers of poultry and straw, stowed very snugly upon the contents, keeping them firmly in place. Always put the different kinds in separate packages, and mark the kind on the cover. Generally our best markets for poultry are Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's. Turkey's sell well at either of these occasions, but best at Thanksgiving, especially large ones. After New Year's small turkeys sell better than large. Geese sell best at Christmas, and chickens at New Year's. Lots shipped for these special occasions should arrive in sufficient time before the event to meet the best sale. Poultry that arrives too late often meets a very poor market.

Emperor William's Income.

Epoch: William II. has no fixed salary as emperor of Germany, but there is about a million dollars that he can use if necessary. As king of Prussia, however, he has a civil list amounting to $8,550,000; but the taste for travel and other expenses incurred in the interest of the empire necessitates, it appears, an increase of revenue. So when the reichstag reassembles a proposal will be made to add several millions of marks to the imperial civil list. The emperor's recent journey to Vienna and Rome cost about $200,000. Among the presents that he distributed along his route were eighty diamond rings, thirty diamond and emerald necklaces, fifty scarf pins, thirty gold watches and chains, six sabers studded with diamonds and emeralds and a hundred boxes of cigars.

A city missionary, on her way to visit a poor family where a sickly child was dying from lack of nourishment, was detained at a crossing by a blockade of carriages. On the seat of one elegant turnout, by the side of my lady, sat a pug dog, a string of silver bells around his neck, gold bandages on his paws, and over his sleek coat a daintly embroidered blanket, whose pockets bulged with lumps of sugar. "How much some children miss by not being born pet dogs!" dryly remarked the missionary threading, her way among the vehicles.

Great Mystery Explained.

San Francisco Call.

"Why do so many men part their hair on the left side?"

"Because," replied the barber, brushing back a stray lock. "They've been brought up to it from infancy. A mother facing her boy always holds the comb in her right hand, and it being easiest to comb the hair from left to right, she parts it on the left. The boy when he grows up and is able to comb his own hair finds the part on that side, and follows the line marked out by his mother. That's why the majority of men part on the left."

Horrible Details of a Premature Interment.

In Russia people are oftener than elsewhere condemned—unintentionally, of course—to that most gruesome of all deaths, of which E. P. Poe had such unfeigned horror—buried alive. But the circumstances accompanying this frightful torture are seldom so characteristic or so horrible as in the case of the wife of a peasant in the government of Volhynia, on the borders of Austria, who, according to the local journal Volhynia, was lately buried in a comatose state. She was expecting soon to become a mother at the time of her supposed death. After the "corpse" had been kept the usual time, the parish priest, Konstantinoff, recited the prayers of the burial service in the churchyard; the widower cast three handfuls of earth on the coffin, and all departed except the gravedigger. In filling up the grave the latter shoveled in an unusually large sod of hard earth, which struck the coffin with a loud noise, and woke up the unfortunate woman from her sleep. The horror of her position at once dawned upon her. She cried out in most piteous tones to the gravediggers to rescue her from her horrible death. She solemnly promised them all her property if they would take her from the grave and coffin. The more she cried and entreated the more strenuous were their endeavors to fill in the grave; and on leaving the churchyard when their work was done they still heard her cries and moans. They at once hurried off to her husband, who was surrounded by guests, drinking to the memory of the deceased. Having related what had taken place, the matter was discussed by the guest and neighbors, who soon came rushing in, and it was finally resolved nem. con. that an evil spirit had taken possession of the deceased, and that, in order to prevent her walking at night and disturbing the people, it was absolutely necessary to disinter her and drive an aspen stake through her body. The mir sent a deputation to the priest asking permission to disinter the body and perform this superstitious rite deemed necessary in all such cases. The pope, horrified, hurried off to the churchyard and had the body disinterred in the hope of saving a life, but superstition had already got its victim—the woman was dead, but unmistakable signs showed she had struggled hard to escape from the most horrible death the human mind can conceive.

Brains or Beauty.

John Stuart Mill regarded the institution of marriage in its highest aim and accept as "a union to persons of cultivated faculties, identical in opinion and purposes, between whom their exists that best kind of equality, similiarity of powers with reciprocal superiority in them, so that one can enjoy the luxury of looking up to the other and can have alternately the pleasure of leading and being led in the path of development."

Overstocked with Mediocres.

When any profession or calling is over-stocked it means, generally, that there's too large an amount of mediocrity in such profession or calling. Or, in other words, there are too many who can do the same thing equally well. There is always a place for the better worker, the man or woman whose individuality and originality can strike out in some new path and make an improvement on the old method, providing such worker has force enough to keep on pushing his or her talent to the front and not use that same force up in dwelling on discouragements.—Prentice Mulford in New York Star.

"Tom," said a small child to her younger brother, "if you are a good boy, when you die you'll go up to heaven and be an angel." Tom looked up at the blue sky with big inquisitive eyes, then he nodded his curly head. "I'll be a good boy," he said earnestly. "And if you're a very good boy maybe you'll be an angel before you die." Tom looked thoughtful for a moment, then he said doubtfully, I guess I won't be a very good boy."

A Tale Of An "H."

Charles Whymper, the well-known engraver and animal painter of London, told a Pittsburg Dispatch man the following story a few years ago:

"I dined at Alderman So-and so's last night, and as a mark of honor his eldest daughter was assigned to me to take down to dinner. She's a bright girl, but the way she drops her 'h's' is enough to make a man's hair turn gray. But I got along very nicely with her, and Lady Bletherington on the other side, until the ladies were on the eve of retiring to the drawing room. "The Alderman had but recently moved out to Highgate; and I was talking about the beautiful scenery near the house, the views to be had from the windows, the fine air, and so on, when Miss——suddenly said, 'I think I get prettier every day, don't you?'

"What did she mean? I didn't dare to answer her, so I said, 'I beg your pardon—what did you say?'

"'I said I think I get prettier every day.'

"There was no mistake in her words, so I said, 'Yes, I think so too, and no wonder in such fresh air and—'

"But just then she caught her mother's eye, and with the other ladies she rose and left the room. As she went out she looked back over her shoulder with such a withering scorn in her eyes that I knew I had put my foot in it somehow. Then it flashed upon me that I had misunderstood her; she had dropped an h; what she had said was not a silly compliment to herself—the sentence really was, 'I think Highgate prettier every day.'"

I think Mr. Whymper was never invited to Alderman So-and-so's again.

NOW, IS BILL A LIAR OR NOT?

From Time.

"Bill Jones is a liar,"
Said father to Joe;
"I'm sure that he is,
For he told me so."

"For that very cause,"
Said Joseph apace,
"I'll prove that Bill Jones
Is off of his base."

"He says he's a liar,
Well, now, if that's true,
There's no sort of sense
In what he told you.

"Because, don't you see?"
Continued the youth,
"He can't be a liar
And tell you the truth."

"If Bill tells the truth
He's a liar, you see;
And if he's a liar,
It's quite plain to me.

"That on his own word
(We cannot go higher),
He lies when he says it,
And he isn't a liar."

AN UNEXPECTED VISIT

It was with the air of a man profoundly indifferent to his own successes, that Gerard Strickland, twitching his cuffs and stretching his arms, before letting his hands fall into his lap, sank back into the luxurious arm-chair by his library fire, after throwing on the table the letter that announced his promotion to an enviable post in the civil service. As he thought of the post, his advancement seemed to him no subject for congratulations, but only one of those grim jets with which fortune delights to mock disappointed men.

An old man-servant, one of a sort growing rare, entered the room with an evening paper. He laid it at his master's side, and stood at a respectful distance, waiting, half-hesitating, with some anxiety legible in his countenance.

"Well, Thomas?" asked Strickland.

"I beg your pardon, sir; but do you remember what day it is to-day?"

"No, Thomas."

"Your wedding-day, sir!"

Strickland's face clouded.

"I did not know, sir, whether you would wish for dinner the same wine—as you used to have."

"No, Thomas; I shall probably dine at the club."

"I ordered dinner as usual, sir; and a bouquet, in case"——

"Quite right, Thomas, quite right.'

For an instant the heart of the promoted official sank. The fidelity of his old domestic was humiliating. How he would once have resented the suggestion that Thomas would remember this anniversary better than himself! And that it should fall to the old servant to order from the florist the bouquet Gerrard himself had been formerly so proud to bring home, on this evening, to his wife. But the slight sense of annoyance passed away quickly. It was with absolute indifference that, seeing the man-servant still waiting, he asked—

"Anything else, Thomas?"

"This morning, when you had but just gone, a young lady called. Hearing you were not at home, she said she would call again this evening about 6. She wished to see you on important business."

"Her name?"

"She left none."

"Did you see her?"

"No, sir."

"Did John say what she was like?"

"Rather tall, sir; a young lady, dark, and fashionably dressed."

"If she calls I will see her. You may go, Thomas." The servant left, and Strickland continued to himself. "Tall, young, dark, well-dressed, business with me. Who can she be?"

"The lady is here sir, in the drawing-room," said Thomas, returning to the library after about ten minutes.

Strickland went to the drawing-room. At the door he paused a moment to steal a look at his visitor. She stood by one of the tables idly turning the leaves of a photograph-album. Her back was toward him and he could distinguish only the tall and graceful figure of a woman, well-dressed and wearing expensive laces.

"Madam!" he said, advancing.

The lady turned, Strickland started as if he had received an electric shock. To conceal, to the best of his ability, his surprise and the sudden pallor of his face, he made her a profound bow.

"I hope I am not inconveniencing you," she said, at the same time returning his salute. Then, with a quiet ease she selected a chair and sat down.

"Not in the least; I am at your service," said Strickland.

"As I shall avail myself of your condescension, I hope that was not merely a compliment."

"May I ask you how I can oblige you?"

The lady stroked the soft fur of her muff, and once or twice lifted her searching eyes to his face. Apparently she was hesitating to name the purpose of her visit. Meanwhile, Strickland gratified his eyes with a good look at her, lovely, fascinating still, as the first day he had seen her. Only her pure profile had gained more decision, and her eyes had a profounder meaning than when he last looked into them, as those of a woman who had lived and suffered.

At length she said:

"Do you still correspond with my father?"

"Yes. It is, however, a fortnight since I last wrote to him."

"I received a letter from him yesterday. He is coming to town to-morrow."

This time Strickland made no attempt to conceal his surprise.

"To-morrow! Your father, who never leaves home!"

"The medical men order him to the south coast, and he will, on his way, stop in town, to spend the night with—"

She paused.

"His daughter," said Strickland.

"He says his son. And so we find ourselves in a pleasant embarrassment."

She leant back, and with a small hand began drubbing a waltz on the table at her side.

"You call it pleasant," said Strickland.

"I did not come here to discuss words, but to discover a plan of action."

"I see none."

"And you are a politician, a man of genius! If those subtle arts, that have been so successfully employed in your own advancement, could be, without prejudice to you, this once employed to extricate me from——"

"Excuse me, madam; but your reproaches are scarcely likely to assist me to exercise my imagination."

"Bah! Well, I have a plan. First, I do not wish, cost what it may, to let my father know—the truth."

"The unhappy truth!"

She made a little grimace, and proceeded: "My father would be cruelly hurt, and the sins of the children ought not to be visited upon their parents. My remorse—I beg your pardon, that is of little consequence here"—she looked aside to warn him not to expostulate, and continued: "Hitherto, thanks to our precautions, the distance of my father's residence, and the seclusion in which he prefers to live, has been spared this sorrow. To-morrow our clever edifice of dutiful falsehood falls to the ground, and I, at least am unable to conjecture the consequences."

"And I."

"Mr. Strickland, it is absolutely necessary to prevent the scandal. I trust you will assist me. My father must find us together; and we must avoid everything that would serve to awaken suspicion."

She spoke sadly, as well as earnestly. A deep shadow of concern settled on her hearer's face. Wrapped in thought, he delayed the answer. His visitor became impatient.

"Your promised courtesy costs too much?" she demanded.

"No. I am ready. But I see many difficulties. The servants?"

"Give the new man-servant I found here this morning a holiday. I will speak to Thomas."

"If a friend should call?"

"You will see no one."

"If we meet your father, people will see us together."

"We will go in a closed carriage."

"Your father will stay here several hours. Good and simple-hearted as he is, do you believe it possible he will not recognize a—bachelor's house?"

"I will send my work, my music, and so on, this evening. My room?"

"Is as you left it."

"Sentimentality!"

"No—respect."

"Have you any further objections?"

"None. It remains to be seen whether we shall be able to deceive Mr. Gregory."

"By playing the affectionate couple. Can you remember your grimaces and fooleries of two years ago?" she asked sarcastically.

"No; I have forgotten them," replied Srickland, with a frown.

And the two looked into each other's eyes, like two duellists.

"When will you come here?" asked Strickland.

"This evening. I will bring my things, and I shall slightly disarrange this and that. I hope I shall not inconvenience you. You are not expecting any one?"

"No one. I was going out. If you wish I will stay and assist you. My engagement is unimportant."

"Pray go. We should have to talk, and we have nothing to say to each other."

"Nothing. Will you dine here?"

"No, thanks; I'll go home now, and return by and by."

She rose. Strickland bowed in response to her bow, conducted her to the door without another word, and returned with a sense of relief to the library.

When he returned home, shortly after midnight, the house had resumed an aspect long strange to it. Lights were burning in the drawing-room, and a little alteration in the arrangement of the furniture had restored to the room a forgotten grace. Bouquets of flowers filled the vases, and a faint sweetness of violets floated about the hall and staircase. The piano was open, and some music stood on the bookstand. On the boudoir table was a work-basket. By the hearth his visitor was sitting in a low chair, her little feet buried in the bear-skin rug, and her head reposed on her hand, while she gazed wistfully into the fire.

Was it a dream? Bertha's flowers; Bertha's music. Bertha herself in his home again! Two year's misery cancelled in an evening! In a moment rushed across his memory a golden wooing, a proud wedding, happy months, and the bitter day of separation. He turned away, and passed to his room, saying, "Good night!"

"Good night!" replied his wife without moving.

The strange event that had taken place in Gerard Strickland's house prevented none of its inmates enjoying a wholesome night's rest. Bertha, persuaded that to-morrow's comedy could affect no real change in her relation to her husband, went to her room with the feelings of one who spends a night in a hotel. Strickland, similarly regarding the past as irremediable, read in bed for half an hour, and then fell asleep.

To get married they had both committed a thousand follies. After meeting her at a table-d'hote, Strickland had pursued her half over Europe, vanquished the difficulties of an approach to her father in his secluded country house, and ultimately, assisted by the lady's prayers and tears, gained the old man's reluctant consent to surrender his idolized daughter. The young married people, passionately attached to each other, enjoyed fifteen months of remarkable happiness, then came the end.

Bertha became jealous. Devoted to her husband, proud, hasty, immoderate in all her thoughts and emotions, she resented with all the intensity of her nature, a meeting between Strickland and a former flame, a dance, a note, half-an hour's conversation. The husband unfortunately met her passionate expostulations with the disdainful insouciance of an easy temperament. The inevitable consequence ensued, a bitter misunderstanding. An imprudent servant, a malicious acquaintance, half-a-dozen venomous tongues, lashed the wife's jealously into madness. An explanation demanded from her husband was refused with a sneer. He had begun to think her a proud, unloving woman, and, under the circumstances, judged self-justification ridiculous. The following morning she entered his library, and with marvelous calmness, without quavering over a single word announced to him their immediate separation—for ever. Taken by surprise, Strickland tried to temporize, acknowledged that he had been thoughtless, did all in a man's power to avoid the rupture. Bertha only replied so proudly, and with so much severity, that self-respect forbade him further self-defense.

They separated. Strickland externally bore his misfortune with quietness, and, in counsel with his own conscience, concluded his life broken and ruined by his own want of tact. The husband and wife met two or three times, as people who barely know each other. He devoted himself to professional duties, resumed some of his bachelor habits, and amused himself as he could. She led a quiet, almost solitary life, restricting her pleasures to such simple enjoyments as she could provide herself at home, and seldom appearing in public. On one point both agreed, repeating such stereotyped phrases as "Bertha is well, and sends her love. I believe she wrote to you a few days ago." "Gerard is well, and at present very busy. He will not this year be able to accompany me to the seaside.

It will be easily believed that to go to her husbands house and to ask a favor of him had cost Bertha's pride a struggle. "For papa's sake; for papa's sake!" she repeated to herself, to steel her nerves to the humiliation, which, however, Strickland's cold courtesy had considerably lessened. If he would be equally considerate on the morrow, a little spirit, a little self-command, and some clever pretending might enable them safely to conduct her father through the few hours to be spent in town, to see him off from Victoria, and, with a polite bow, to separate and return to their several existences.

Dinner was ended, Mr. Gregory smiled contentment and happiness, and the two actors at the opposite ends of the table of necessity smiled too.

Their parts had proved difficult. From the moment of the old gentleman's arrival they had had to call each other by their Christian names, and to use the little endearments of two married people still in love. More than once, a word, an intonation that sounded like an echo of the dead past made Strickland pale and Bertha trembled. Their embarrassment momentarily increased. The more perfect their dissimulation, the bitterer was the secret remorse that wrung the hearts of both of them, whilst they exchanged for meaningless things, words, looks and smiles, once the most sacred signs of affection. With the fear of betraying themselves by an indiscretion was intermixed another, a misgiving lest, while they acted affection, they should be guilty of real feeling warmer than the courteous indifference with which they desired to regard each other.

On the stairs, when Mr. Gregory, preceding them, was for an instant out of sight, Bertha turned back and bestowed on her husband a grim look of fatigue that meant, "How are we to continue this?"

"'Tis only till to-morrow, Bertha," he replied in an undertone, wishing to help her. But the Christian name (which, because he had in the last two hours used it so frequently, unwittingly slipped from his lips), caused her to turn her face away with an angry frown.

By the fire in the back drawing-room Mr. Gregory appeared actuated by a desire to ask all the most awkward questions, and to broach all the topics of conversation most difficult for his host and hostess.

"Letters are welcome, Bertha," he said, "when people cannot meet, but I have enjoyed my little visit more than all the pages you have sent me. There is very little in letters. Don't you think your wife grows handsomer, Strickland?"

"I tell her so every day."

"And so he tells me, Bertha. His letters are all about you. You have a model husband, my dear."

"I have, papa."

Strickland hung his head and regarded the pattern of the carpet

"I should like to see your house, Bertha," said Mr. Gregory, after a moment.

The little party set out on a tour of the mansion. After an inspection of several rooms, as Strickland preceded them into the breakfast room, the father stopped his daughter and said:

"Bertha, where is your mother's portrait?"

"The frame had got shabby and we have sent it to be regilt," replied the daughter, promptly.

"Where does it generally hang?"

"There."

She assigned to the picture, which she had taken with her, the first empty space on the wall that met her eye.

"I don't think that a very good place!" said the old man. "Ah, what a woman she was! What a wonderful woman! You should have known her, Strickland. You owe her your wife. When she was leaving me, poor dear! she made me promise never to hesitate to make any sacrifice that should be for Bertha's happiness; and so, when my little girl came to me and said, 'Papa, I can never be happy without Gerard,' I thought of my dear wife, and let her go. I feared, when I sent her abroad, I should lose her. Well, you were made for each other. Do you remember your first meeting in Paris?"

They remembered it.

The tour of the house was completed, and they returned to the drawing-room, Gerard and his wife congratulating themselves, not without reason, that the good papa was not very observant, for many a token of something abnormal had been plain enough.

* * * * * * *

With a common sigh of relief the two actors sank into their respective corners of their carriage, after seeing Mr. Gregory off the next morning from Victoria. Not a single word was spoken. Bertha watched the drops of rain that trickled down the windows. Gerard studied the back of the coachman. They had again become strangers.

Presently, moving accidentally, Strickland touched his wife's arm.

"I beg your pardon," he said.

"Pray do not mention it."

Perfect strangers! Yet both in the silence were anxiously meditating every event of the past few hours, remembering the most trifling impressions and studying all they signified. As they came near a cross-street the husband asked:

"Shall I drive you to your own house?"

"I am coming to yours, to superintend the packing. My maid cannot do it alone."

On arriving, the wife at once went to her chamber. Strickland, conscious of his utter purposelessness, returned to the back drawing-room and took up the paper. Bertha passed backward and forward. Once or twice he caught a glimpse of her moving about the room. At last he looked up.

"You will tire yourself," he said; cannot I assist you?"

"No, thank you. I have nearly done."

A few minutes later she came and seated herself on the opposite side of the fire. She appeared tired. As she sat, she looked around to see if anything had been forgotten.

"I think it rains less," said Strickland, who had laid down the paper.

"No. It rains just the same as before.

"Is the carriage ready?"

"I have sent to know."

The carriage would be ready in ten minutes.

Those ten minutes seemed an eternity. When the servant entered to say the carriage waited, Bertha rose and stood for a while before the mirror, arranging her laces and ribbons, with difficulty; for her fingers trembled. Then she slowly drew on her gloves and turned toward her husband. He had risen and was standing waiting.

"Good morning," she said, bowing slightly.

He bowed, but made no reply. She turned, and quietly, with calm, even steps, walked from the room. She could hear that he followed her.

They were in the hall. Suddenly he stepped to her side.

"Bertha! You are not going without first forgiving me?" he exclaimed in a voice in which grief mingled with passion.

She turned round, and in an instant had thrown herself into his arms.

"Darling, you will never leave me again?"

"No, no, love. Never!"—From Murray's Magazine.

Pleasures of Being Chewed by Wild Beasts.

In a recent letter to Junius Henri Brown author of a paper of "The Fear of Death," Sir Lyon Playfair writes: "I have known three friends who were partially devoured by wild beasts under apparently hopeless circumstances of escape. The first was Livingstone, the great African traveler, who was knocked on his back by a lion, which began to munch his arm. He assured me he felt no fear or pain, and that his only feeling was one of intense curiosity as to which part of his body the lion would take next. The next was Rusten Pasha, now Turkish ambassador in London. A bear attacked him and tore off his hand and a part of his arm and shoulder. He also assured me that he felt excessively angry because the bear grunted with so much dissatifaction in munching him. The third case is that of Sir Edward Bradford, an Indian officer now occupying a high position in the Indian office. He was seized in a solitary place by a tiger, which held him firmly between his shoulders with one paw, and then deliberatly devoured the whole arm, beginning at the end and ending at the shoulder. He was positive that he had no sensation of fear, and thinks that he felt none during the munching of his arm."

Mr. Vanderbilt's Flagstones.

There are now being shipped at Oxford station, on the Ontario and Western Railroad, a lot of the biggest flagstones ever quarried in the United States. They come from the Clark quarry, about a mile from the station, and are intended to form the sidewalk in front of Mr. Frederick Vanderbilt's new house on Fifth Avenue, New York. There are twenty stones altogether, and each is twenty feet long, ten to fifteen feet in width, and about twelve inches thick. The largest stones now lying in a New York sidewalk are the enormous slabs in front of the Equitable Building, but the Vanderbilt flags are considerably bigger and heavier than those. As they are now being shipped thy are in the rough, and are consigned to Hastings on-the-Hudson, where they will be dressed and finished. The flat cars on which the stones are transported were specially built of a strength to bear the great weight, and special machinery is required for loading and unloading the flags. It is estimated that the stones when laid down in the walk in New York will have cost $1,000 apiece.—N. Y. Times.

Ordinary compliments are of small account, but now and then a man will recieve one that is worth more than the most learned criticism.

One Sunday the rector had been absent, and on his return naturally asked his clerk how he had liked his substitute on the previous Sunday.

"Well, sir," was the unequivocal reply, "saving your Honor, not very well; he was a little too pline for me. I like a preacher as joombles the r'ason and confoonds the joodgment; and of all the born preachers I've heerd, there's none comes up to your reverence for that!"—Churchman.

Whiskey No Antidote.

Dr. A. T. Hudson, of Stockton, Cal. writes: "Having, often seen the statement made in the public press, and sometimes in medical journals, that whisky and ammonia were the acknowleged antidotes to rattlesnake bite, I feel it a duty to administer a corrective to the above fallacious teaching. About thirty years ago Professor Weir Mitchell, of Philadelphia, spent over two years in carefully experimenting with the virus of snake poisons. Taking a few drops of the pure virus from the sac of the snake, he mixed it consecutively with alcohol, ammonia, iodine, bromide, mercury and other reputed antidotes, then injected the solution of each into birds, rabbits, dogs, goats and other animal's—when he found that the poison was not altered in its power, but would produce its specific toxie effect just the same as when it was undiluted. He found also that the virus fatal only to a certain extent, that is if it took half a drop to kill an animal of thirty pounds weight, it would require one or two drops to kill one of sixty to eighty pounds. Its action is immediate, and it kills only when the animal is too small and weak in resistive vatility. It is rare that an adult person dies from the bite of a rattlesnake.

"The virus of the cobra is more intense and fatal. Several years ago a prominent minister in Philadelphia died from the bite of a young cobra. As a given quantity of the rattlesnake virus is necessary to overcome a certain amount of physical force, it is seldom that such quantity is ever deposited by the snake bite upon an adult person. If a large snake should bite a goat of fifty pound weight, and soon after bite two children of about the same weight, the goat might die but the children would not, for the reason that the goat would receive the largest amount of the virus, when there would be but little left to poison the children. In such a case, whisky being used on children their recovery would be attributed to the whisky; so the friends and neighbors would think they have positive proof of a sure antidote in whisky. Here is the fallacy which science alone can demonstrate. If, when whisky is mixed with the poison directly, it is no antidote, how can it become so when taken into the system remotely, the whisky in the stomach and the poison in the goat Physiologically, whisky is antidotal so far as it will sustain the flagging powers during the time the poison is being eliminated by the excretory organs.

"In the light of the above scientific demonstrations, how a doctor can gravely on frantically proceed to treat a rattlesnake bite 'by injecting around the wound permanganate of potassa, or any supposed antidotes, or order a chicken split open and applied to the wound, or the anus of the chicken applied over the wound, using a number of different fowls for the purpose,' is a problem hard to understand in this age of reason."—Medical Record.

How a Hunter Killed a Deadly Reptile While Facing a Furious Tiger.

The beaters had been at work half an hour, says the Times of India when we heard a cry announcing that the man-eater was making his way toward the plain, hustled somewhat by the volleys of stones, but sharpening his claws and growling defiance. In taking up our positions it so happened that Lieut. Farrington was on my right, in line with the mouth of the gully and not more than twenty feet from my elbow. He had a double barreled rifle of heavy caliber, while I had a repeater. In three or four minutes after the cry of warning the tiger appeared in the mouth of the gully, head on to Farrington, and looking him straight in the face.

"Hold on! He's my meat!" shouted the officer, as he brought his gun up, and it became a point of honor with the rest of us to hold our fire. He took cool and careful aim, but the bullet simply touched the skin between the tiger's ears. He dropped like a stone, but was up in an instant, and with a roar to shake any man's nerves he sprang forward at the lieutenant. In the tenth of a second I turned my eyes from the beast to the officer, and what was my horror to see a serpent twining itself about his legs and rearing its head to a level with his shoulder. I forgot all about the oncoming tiger, and for the first time in my life my blood seemed to ice. Farrington stood with his left foot ahead and his right foot braced, and as the tiger touched the ground for his last spring the rifle spoke again, and the beast rolled over with a ball through his brain. Then, while we all kept our places like so many blocks of stone, he dropped his rifle, seized the snake just below the head with his right hand, and came walking toward us. The serpent writhed and twisted about in his rage, and as it uncoiled itself from the man's leg he flung it thirty feet away. It was rushing back at him, when one of the party with a shotgun at his shoulder blew its head off.

"Good shot," remarked Farrington, as he walked back and picked up his rifle.

We ran after him and shook his hand and showered unstinted praise on him for his nerve, but he would not be a hero. It was the presence of the serpent, which was of a highly poisonous species, which had disturbed his first aim. He felt it under his foot, and realized that its bite meant death, but a maddened tiger was before him, and he did not give the snake a second thought.

A farmer's man brought the village doctor a note the other day, and with some difficulty Medicus spelt out, "Please send me a bottle of fissic." "Hallo," exclaimed the doctor, "F-i-s-s-i-c, dosen't spell physic." "Don't it," answered the rustic, "what do it spell, then?" The doctor gave it up.

There is this difference between the poor and the good farmer: One complains of the bad seasons, the other rejoices in the good seasons.

A CANDIDATE'S SUPPER.

He Is Defeated, But the Boys Devour His Goodies All the Same.

It wasn't so many years ago, says the Boston Transcript, that a candidate for mayor of Chelsea, having accepted the assurance of his heelers that he was sure to be elected, prepared in his house a nice spread sufficient for a large number of the boys, to celebrate his victory. There were turkey sandwiches and several varieties of frosted cake, and ice cream and coffee, and possibly a drop of something else for the inner circle. On election night the candidate modestly remained at home, receiving advices from time to time from his supporters. Just as the polls closed he was elected "by a large majority," of course; both candidates are always elected by a large majority at that sanguine period. But a little later as the returns came in from the distant wards, and gains and losses were figured up, it began to be apparent that the vote was closer than the heelers had expected. Then it began to be more dubious still; and at about nine o'clock the boys began to see that the democratic candidate was going to be beaten. They bethought themselves of that spread over at the house. Was that elegant "lay out" to be lost? The boys had just one chance for it and they took it. Over to the candidate's house they rushed with a great shout. There wasn't much in the shout but "Hooray!" but it was calculated to convey the impression to the candidate himself that he was elected. "Hooray!" In they poured and elbowed their way to the dining-room. "How has it gone? How has it gone?" asked the candidate, anxiously. There was another confused shout, drowning all definite response, and—the boys were all at the vituals, devouring sandwiches ice cream, frosted cakes and coffee, indiscriminately and eagerly. The candidate enjoyed one moment of exultation and then sent his son around to the headquarters to see what the result was. In a few minutes the youth returned with a dejected countenance. "You're beaten by seventy-nine plurality, father."

It was too late, however, to save the spread. The candidate was inclined to protest a little with one or two of the leaders, but they told him, with a grin that they thought the boys might as well have the supper any way.

A Boston Sight.

The following incident of "diamond cut diamond" occurred in a Boston restaurant the other day. An acquaintance of the writer was seated at one of the tables enjoying his noonday lunch. It was somewhat near the closing part of the dinner hour, and, as frequently is the case, some of the articles of the daily fare were about exhausted. A late customer entered the restaurant and took a seat at the same table with the gentleman first noted. This late arrival, evidently in somewhat of a hurry, gave his entire order at the one time, but as soon as the waiter had returned with the same he was chagrined to see that cold bread was served him instead of the warm biscuits he expected, the stock of the latter having run out. However, not to be deprived of the luxury desired, he unceremoniously reached across the domain of the earlier diner, picked up the solitary biscuit that yet remained on the latter's plate, and commenced to eat it, whereupon the other, not to be outdone in the matter of a good reach and the ability to employ it, extended his arm, gathered in the piece of pie that belonged to the original offender, and proceeded to regale himself. "That is my pie, sir!" came the prompt protest. "That is my biscuit!" was the cool rejoinder. A silence followed, only broken by the patter of the waiter's feet upon the tessellated floor. It was a clear case of "diamond cut diamond."

An Indian Relic.

George W. Howard, of Siloam, has laid upon our table another relic of the aborigines in the shape of a sharp-pointed hammer made of rock. The specimen before us is the greatest curiosity in the line we have yet seen. It is about five and one-half inches long and in the thickest part an even inch through, gradually tapering either way to a point. It is made of hard granite, and the most remarkable thing about it is that it has a hole bored or drilled through the center, evidently where the handle went in. This hole is perfectly made, being larger at one end than at the other. As the Indians had no implements of steel or iron, the mystery is, how was this hole drilled so perfectly? It seems utterly impossible to have accomplished the work with another rock without shattering both to pieces. The hammer, or whatever it is, was found by Mr. Howard in Warren county—Greenville (Ga.) Sun.

VIRTUE REWARDED.

How a Canvasser for a Religious Paper Captured a Jersey Town.

Benevolence beamed from his eyes. His nose had piety in its straightness of contour. Over his lips language gently trickled as honey from an overfull hive. In short, he was a first-class canvasser for a religious newspaper, and this is the story he told the topical talker of the Pittsburgh Dispatch: "Last summer I was pushing a New York religious journal in the becalmed villages of central New Jersey. One afternoon I reached a little place which can very appropriately be called Sleepyville. It was the drowsiest collection of houses, human beings and cows, especially cows, that I had encountered all that summer. But it was prosperity, plenty to eat and drink, plenty of time to do both, which made the village close its eyes half the day and all night.

"I went straight to the minister's house. Never think of going anywhere else first, my boy, if you are canvassing for a religious paper. The minister was a nice fellow, and I booked him early in the day. He pressed me to stay to supper. It was warm, the minister was entertaining, his quarters comfortable, so I stayed. After supper the minister had to go to prayer meeting. He asked me to go along. It was not my cue to refuse. I went.

"After there had been some praying done and a hymn had been sung the minister rose and, looking at me, said: 'We will now ask Brother ——,' meaning me, 'to lead in prayer.'

"I thought mighty quick for about ten seconds; my thinking flywheel flew around. It was a question of policy I was debating in that interval. Then I said: 'For a reason which I shall be very glad to explain after the meeting is over, I must beg to be excused from leading the prayers.'

"The pastor accepted my declination gracefully and called upon somebody else. After the meeting was over I went up to the minister and said: 'The reason I did not accept your kind invitation to lead in prayer was that I was afraid my motives might be misunderstood. You see my business is to obtain subscriptions for a certain religious paper. If I had lead in prayer some members of your congregation would have been sure to have suspected me of trying to advertise my paper in church. Neither I nor my employers would telerate such a suspicion for a moment.'

"The minister was profuse in his praise of my straightforward methods. I think he must have said something about the matter to his congregation, for with hardly an exception they subscribed for the paper. Verily virtue has its own reward."

Living Facts.

There 3,064 languages in the world, and its inhabitants profess more than 1,000 religions.

The number of men is about equal to the number of women. The average of life is about 33 years. One-quarter die previous to the age of 17. To every 1,000 persons only one reaches 100 years of life. To every 100 only six reach the age of 65, and not more than one in 500 lives to 80 years of age.

There are on earth 1,000,000,000 inhabitants; of these 33,033,033 die every year; 91,834 every day; 3,730 every hour, and 60 every minute, or 1 every second.

The married are longer lived than the single and, above all, those who observe a sober and industrious conduct. Tall men live longer than short ones. Women have more chances of life in their favor previous to 50 years of age than men have, but fewer afterward.

The number of marriages is in the proportion of 75 to every 1,000 individuals. Marriages are more frequent after equinoxes—that is, during the months of June and December.

Those born in spring are generally of a more robust constitution than others. Births are more frequent by night than by day, also deaths.—Golden Argosy.

Vain of Her Eyes and Lost Them.

About a year ago one of the most lovely girls in the state lived at 40 Orange avenue, in this city. A pair of large, liquid blue eyes set off a face that would put any picture to shame, and her form was simply perfect. The young lady was highly educated and possessed all the qualities that go to make up a society belle. Her parents are well-to-do and she has wanted for nothing since she was old enough to prattle. But she has one fault and that fault has proved her undoing. It is called vanity. She fairly worshiped her own eyes and did everything in her power to make them more beautiful than they were. She used numerous drugs before she found what she wanted. This last drug made her eyes sparkle like diamonds, and she used it to such an extent that her right eye began to shrivel. This brought her to her senses and the family physician was called in. But he came to late, and informed the poor girl that she must lose one of her eyes sure and probably both. The right eye was taken out some time ago and she has lost all sight in the left and will be blinded for life. It is one of the saddest cases that was ever brought to light in this city.—Los Angeles Times.

A Moravian Freak.

Another edition of the Siamese twins has just seen the light of the world. The wife of a poor workman at Misslitz, in Moravia, was delivered of triplets, two of the babies grown together by the ribs and having a common breast bone. The rest of the two bodies is perfectly developed in every part.

Nothing tires a smart man so quickly as seeing a lazy man resting himself.—Martha's Vineyard Herald.

A Mother's Trial.

"Mildred, I give you ten minutes to make up your mind."

So spoke my husband, consulting his watch.

"You make one feel like a woman in 'Josephus,' who was invited to see her child cut in half," said I, with an uneasy laugh.

"An exactly parallel case," agreed my husband, with lazy sarcasm, watching me with half-closed eyes from behind a volume of tobacco smoke.

"If only baby might go, too!" I murmured, plaintively. I am quite sure the change would do her good."

"Absurd!" interrupted my husband, impatiently.

I looked up a little wistfully.

Could it be possible he did not love that darling child of ours so well as I? Oh, how could he want me to leave it if she should die?

So introspective were my thoughts that it was only gradually I perceived that he was gazing down upon me with a smile of obvious amusement.

"I can imagine that you are thinking of me," he said, as our eyes met. "Well, I suppose I am a hard-hearted, indifferent sort of person to be entrusted with such a treasure; but Mildred, I do not see the sense of giving up everything for that child. The baby is in perfect health. It will be safe and happy with its excellent nurse, under my mother's supervision. Think of our trotting off together on a second wedding journey! And this trip would just about set you up again. If you are going systematically to work to destroy your good looks, you are succeeding very well, my love, for the lines are coming;" and my husband leaned down to trace, I hope, imaginary wrinkles on my brow. "But, on the other hand," he added, tilting up my chin with one finger, and speaking seriously at last, "if you would only go through a sense of duty, with the spirit of a martyr, then, Mildred, I had rather you would stay at home."

How handsome he looked and how young! Somehow, I did not relish the prospect of transformation into a withered old woman with snappy black eyes.

I threw all my doubts and scruples to the winds, smiled bravely up into his face, and cried "I'll go!"

"Well said!" declared my husband, catching me round the waist, and executing a wild gallop round the room.

Already I began to feel youth again in my veins.

Only in the hurry and excitement of preparation now and again would creep in the thought of my little Mabel.

"If only she might have gone, too!"

But I suppose it was ridiculous to think of taking an eighteen-months'-old baby on a six weeks' trip to the continent, so I smothered my yearning as best I might, and folded my baby's socks and dresses, and ranged them neatly in their places with something akin to remorse in my heart.

A thousand instructions I gave the good-natured nurse, entreating her to be careful and watchful of my treasure; and at the last moment, with my little Mabel's clinging arms around my neck and her cheek to mine, I would have relinquished evrything to be left behind with her.

But it would never do to let Philip suspect this. He was the kindest of husbands, with a smooth, gay temper, and the most joyous temperment I ever met with.

He would romp with the baby, in perfect abandonment, for an hour at a stretch; but, like the generality of men, he hated noise and confusion, the bother of naughty babies in particular.

When my baby came, like most young mothers, I threw myself into my new duties with more zeal than discretion; and I think my husband resented, unconsciously, my defection, and was resolved I should not give up entirely my own life.

At last we were on our way home again. In the same carriage was a poor, delicate baby, whose mother had died in Italy, and the father was now bringing it home again.

My heart ached for the forlorn little creature, so helpless in the arms of the heedless nurse.

Philip smiled quizzically as I poured out an endless torrent of sympathy.

"I see what you are after," he said, at last, when he found my eyes following the baby; "and if it will do those empty arms of yours any good to worry over the poor little beggar, nurse it by all means. And, Mildred," —this more seriously—"do not think I have not observed and appreciated your unselfishness all along. I see the mother-love is too strong in you; I shall never part you from your child again."

You may imagine I was the happier for this speech—indeed, my heart was full of charity for all the world.

I took my husband at his word, and fairly usurped the nurse's place to the poor, motherless infant, whose little life was waning fast.

When we landed at Dover, the end was so near I had not the heart to let it go out of my sight.

Even Philip was saddened by this little tragedy enacted before him. And was it a premonition that made me so pityingly tender to the little soul, gasping its last faint breaths upon my knee?

Well, it was over at last, and I gave up my little lifeless burden to others' care.

I yearned afresh for the living child I longed to clasp in my arms; and Phillip, reading my heart aright did not seek to delay. An early morning train found us on our way.

Then, as the carriage neared the house, he held my hands in a firm clasp, stroking them gently the while; and somehow, this kept back the agitation that was becoming hysterical.

But the house! Instead of sweet baby features, pressed against the window panes—in place of the laughing baby-eyes, and the out-stretched baby-fingers I had pictured myself—the cruel white shutters were fastened close, and white streamers floated from between them.

My husband caught me in his arms, and led me up the steps. I can recall now the tension of his hold, and in a dream I heard the servant half whisper, "Yes, sir; was taken with croup in the night, sir; the doctor said nothing could save it."

"Let me go to my child," I cried out in such a strange voice I hardly recognize it myself; and then I put away my husband's protecting arm, turned a stony gaze upon his pitying eyes, and shut myself into the dim room, where, embedded in flowers, lay all that I could ever see of my little Mabel!

Oh, the agony that filled me to suffocation!—the thought that while I had been nursing that other strange child my own had been dying, without its mother's hand to sooth and cling to.

Oh, surely she must be only sleeping? She looked so lovely and lifelike, with her dimpled rosebud hand lying so peacefully on her bosom! And yet she had strangled to death; perhaps her poor, pitiful blue eyes had been wistfully seaching for me, while I, her mother, had not been there to save or help her!

How long I stood there motionless, tearless, with suffocation at my throat and bursting in agony in my heart, I know not.

But at last I became aware that Philip and his mother were standing beside the little coffin, too; and Philip's mother was detailing, in her formal, precise manner, how it had happened.

After being prepared for bed, the nurse had allowed her to patter around the room in her little bare feet, and when my mother-in-law happened to look into the nursury, on her way down stairs, she had found the child building houses with her blocks. She had reprimanded the nurse for her carelessness, and had seen the child put in her bed. (While I, no matter what my engagements, always unrobed her myself, and, tiny as she was, had taught her to fold her hands and say, "Pray God, make Mabel good, that she may come to heaven!" Well, she was safely in heaven now, while I, her desolate mother, would never know happiness any more.)

About eleven o'clock the nurse had hurridly awakened my husband's mother, and informed her that Mabel was very ill—choking and then they summoned the doctor; but the delay and the severity of the attack was fatal. The physician saw at a glance the case was hopeless. "And you may thank God," ended my mother-in-law in her most piteous tone, "that you was spared the trial of her last agony."

But this was too much. I felt myself shuddering in a terrible way; but when my husband, with the tears streaming down his face, would have drawn me to him, I shrank away.

"Do not touch me!" I shrieked, hoarsely, "You and that woman"—pointing fiercely at his astonished mother—"between you were the cause of her death!"

And then I fell forward in a dead faint.

I think in the days that followed my reason to a degree was unsettled. At times I felt the dreariest apathy and indifference; the next impulse would be one of exaltation.

At least the child was happy, nothing could altar that.

But this mood could not last, and through it all I felt an unreasoniong enmity and aversion I was at no trouble to conceal from my husband's mother.

She was a cold and very haughty woman, and I think she never forgave those mad words I uttered beside my dead child's coffin.

It was war to the knife between us, until my life grew to be so intolerable, that the thought of getting away from it took complete possession of me.

Phillip was very patient with me all this time, but I think my wild words made an impression on him, too, that acted like a restraint. There was perfect gentleness, but no warmth, in the caresses he gave me, always as though he were expecting a repulse. I think if he had once taken me in his arms, and kissed me with the old lover-like passion, it would have thawed the icy barrier of despair that was breaking my heart.

As it was, my life became so insupportable that I resolved to end it. I would go away until I could reason myself into a more Christain frame of mind.

Perhaps it would be a relief to Phillip. I knew so well how he disliked life without amusement; and I had been dull enough since my child died. Perhaps he would even be unconcerned should I never return.

But this thought gave me a strange pang, even as I wrote a few cold lines acquainting him with my intention, and asking him not to question it. And then, one dreary March morning I slipped out of the house, unobserved, and went away.

How different was this return to my old home from what I had pictured it! I threw myself into my mother's arms, and sobbed out at last the cold weight upon my heart.

And yet I was more miserable than ever as the days crept along; and in my husband's brief but perfectly courteous letters there was never a mention of my going home again, nor a word of his coming to me.

Gradually the sorrowing after my lost child was swallowed up in the conviction that I had hopelessly alienated my husband by my mad, ill-advised step. I knew his temperament so well.

How readily he was impressed with external surroundings—charmed with what was pleasant, disgusted with what was disagreeable or stupid. And, long ago, he had told me I was losing my looks.

What would he think now, if he could see this poor, colorless creature, with the great hollow eyes, and hands so thin my wedding-ring was continually dropping off.

My mother was greatly mystified.

It perplexed her that I would neither write for Phillip, nor allow her to send; for, even yet, pride was stronger than life with me.

"But, my love," she would remonstrate, "you are really far from strong, and I do not like the responsibility in your present condition."

But this only set me more obstinately against making him aware of my state of health.

"Perhaps," I thought, with a wave of self-pity sweeping over me, "after I am dead he might be sorry."

And so the day crept along until my time of trial was at hand. I realized dimly that I was very ill. And, oh! how I longed for the tender touch, the gentle hand, of the husband that loved me no longer, else surely he would have been with me now!

For at the beginning my mother knelt beside me, and whispered, softly, "I have sent for Philip."

Those words had kept me up. And to my constant plaint, "Has he not come?" my mother's answer was ever, "Not yet, dear."

But at last she could no longer conceal from me that she had news of some sort; and to quiet my feverish impatience she confessed to a letter from my husband's mother.

"The letter!" I cried, impatiently.

"He was not at home, my love," urged my mother, feebly trying to escape.

But I only repeated, "The letter!" with such a sudden access of energy my mother produced it.

It ran thus:

"DEAR MADAM—I regret to hear of your daughter's illness, which I learned from your telegram. I took the liberty of opening it, as my son was not at home. He has not informed me, but it is my opinion that he has gone away to institute proceedings for a bill of separation—"

I read no more. Why should I? I was done with life, and fell back among my pillow, unconscious.

I never should have written this had there not been such a happy ending.

When I came back to life again it was to find my husband, all travel-stained and weary as he was, kneeling beside my couch.

One look between us was enough; happiness had come back to me. Without a word, I knew he loved me, as

"Two clear souls
That see one truth, and turning also see
Each other's faces glow in that truth's light,
Are something more than lovers."

"And here is your new daughter, Phillip," said my mother, as she came bustling in, in her kindly way, with a tiny bundle of lace and embroidery on her arm.

My poor husband's face flushed painfully as he stood looking down at the little creature.

"God grant I may take better care of her!" he commenced, brokenly. Then, presently, he added, "Mildred, we will call it Theodore—'the gift of God'"

I have lived to feel that we are both the happier for the trial sent us. It has made my husband a much more serious man.

Sold to Strangers.

The worn-out blinds hang loosely,
The paint is nearly gone,
The creaking gate swings idly,
The old place looks forlorn;
The myrtle mound is grass-grown,
That blossomed years ago,
And one by one have vanished
The flowers I used to know.

The ancient tree whose cherries
Rejoiced my childish heart
Stands leafless, grim and groaning;
The arbor's dropped apart—
That arbor in the garden
Where honeysuckle twined;
The once broad path that led there
Is now but ill defined.

The dear, quaint, old mansion,
It held our kith and kin
For eighty years and over,
Till they were gathered in,
And now it goes to strangers;
Its glories all are fled
Since those who built the hearth-fire
Are numbered with the dead;

While we who love it fondly
Must give a parting sigh,
A farewell look, and sadly,
Forever, pass it by.
And still the fragrant lilies
May bloom beside the door,
But strangers' footsteps echo
Across the oaken floor.

Neither Was Slighted.

It was in 1864, and in the St. James Military Hospital in New Orleans. A box of gifts had been sent from Boston to the soldiers. The lady who had distributed the articles in this box among the soldiers in the hospital had got down to the last thing in the bottom—a pair of stockings with a love letter in the toe. She entered a ward where the brave Michigan and Indiana sufferers were convalescing after the terrible battle of Baton Rouge. Before her, on their cots, there lay two mutilated but cheerful young fellows, covered with sheets. She held up the parcel and said:

"But one pair left—draw lots for them!"

"It's all right, Mrs. R.," said one of the boys; "one for each!"

He held up one amputated leg, without the foot. And the other, saying not a word, but with a smile, showed that his leg was gone above the knee. —Boston Transcript.

One Who Knows Enough to Mind His Own Business.

The other day a Brooklyn boy of six years, who had been "pestering" one of his little brothers, was sentenced by his mother to sit for an hour in a high chair in one corner of the sitting-room as a punishment. During the hour a friend of the family came in. The culprit had a Bible in his hands and pretended to be reading very intently. The friend of the family, having been informed of the "punishment," went up to the lad and asked: "Are you reading about the little boy who troubles his brother?"

"No," promptly replied Young America. "I'm reading about God, who knows enough to mind his own business."

Washburn Nominated.

The republican senatorial caucus was held in the assembly room at the capitol building in St. Paul on Thursday evening of last week. There were present 122 of the 123 republicans in the legislature. The first informal ballot stood:

Whole number votes cast	121
Necessary to choice	61
Washburn	52
Sabin	43
Donnelly	15
Start	2
Nelson	7
Cole	1
Strait	1

This ballot was a surprise to those friends of Sabin who knew that the senator had positive pledges of more than the number necessary to elect. The ballots proceeded as follows:

1ST FORMAL BALLOT.

Whole number of votes cast	121
Necessary to a choice	61
Washburn	58
Sabin	46
Donnelly	10
Nelson	3
Strait	2

3D FORMAL BALLOT.

Whole number of votes cast	122
Necessary to a choice	62
Washburn	62
Sabin	54
Start	2

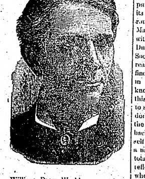
Senator Buckman moved to make the nomination unanimous. Gen. Washburn was introduced, who spoke as follows:

Gentlemen of the Caucus and Fellow Republicans: You must understand that after the severe contest we have had I am well worn out and not in condition to make a speech, but I should fail to be true to the institutions which I believe characterize high honor which I have received at your hands. If your action is ratified by the convention next week you can rely on me as a loyal and true republican to work for the best interests of the state and of the whole state. I promise it shall have my best efforts while I occupy that position. Again I thank you. I am pleased with the methods which have characterized this contest. It has been amiable and friendly throughout. I have no words to express my thanks.

Senator Sabin in response to loud calls responded as follows:

I am much in the condition of Gen. Washburn, only more so. I am not only tired out and worn out, but cleaned out. But I should be untrue to the instincts of the manhood I believe I possess if I did not appear and express my loyalty to the party which, I believe, has made a wise choice. I shall be loyal to Minnesota and I expect to make my home here. I am loyal to the party which has been swept by a whirlwind into power. I am loyal to the principles of the party. I wish to extend to my loyal friends who made such a gallant fight my heartfelt thanks, and also my regrets for those three lacking votes.

Calls for Donnelly failed to reveal the sage who had remained at the Merchant's hotel during the session, so the caucus adjourned.



William Drew Washburn was born Jan. 14, 1831, in Livermore, Me. His family is one which has furnished many distinguished names. Young Washburn remained on his father's farm until his 20th year, going to the village school in winter and working in the fields in summer. He attended Gorham academy later, and finally completed his preparatory studies at Farmington academy. In 1851 he entered Bowdoin college, and graduated in 1854. While pursuing his collegiate studies he was almost entirely dependent on his own efforts for support, and defrayed his expenses by teaching school and other labors in vacation time. During one vacation he was clerk of the house of representatives of Maine. He studied law with his brother, but business pursuits had more attraction for him than the profession of Blackstone. He came to Minneapolis in 1857 and became agent of the Minneapolis Mill company, but carried on his duties in connection with his law practice. In 1861 President Lincoln commissioned him surveyor general of Minnesota and he removed to St. Paul. Four years later he came back to Minneapolis where he built a large sawmill and engaged in the lumber trade, which has more or less engrossed his energies ever since. In 1870 he was the chief mover in projecting and building the Minneapolis & St. Louis railroad. In 1875 he became its president. His connection with the "Soo" and Minneapolis & Pacific roads is familiar. In addition to his other business ventures Mr. Washburn is a stockholder of the Minneapolis Harvester Works, a part owner in some of the flouring mills, at the head of the Washburn (lumber) Mill company, and the builder of the large sawmills at Anoka. He is also the president of the Minneapolis Industrial Exposition directory, to which place he has been twice re-elected.

Gen. Washburn has been a prominent figure in Minnesota politics since 1871, when he was elected to the lower house of the legislature. In 1878 he was elected to congress and he was twice re-elected.

Warren Sheaf: The fact that W. D. Washburn and J. J. Hill work on an evener is enough to bring reproach upon him by the enemies of railroad monopolies.

Moorhead News: It is not quite clear which gentleman the Sheaf means to refer to by its "him," who is reproached by the enemies of railroad monopolies; but by accepted rules of grammar it is Mr. Hill. Now let us inform you, Brother Sheaf, that the influence of President J. J. Hill and the great Manitoba Railroad company from its president down to the brakeman on the "Bobtail" train which runs over the St. Vincent extension which the Sheaf has so eloquently and frantically raised its voice against as an outrage upon freemen, are using their combined influence against Washburn in the senatorial contest. The reason is not altogether a political one either, but springs from the fact that the Manitoba company fears the "Soo" system as its greatest competitor and rival. If the people down the valley had not been led estray by false political advisers, they would encourage the man who has it in his power and really intends to extend his great system of road down the valley, which event would confer upon the people down there more real benefit than any other railroad or other industrial development which is likely to be made. Look on the map and see how direct a branch line of the "Soo" road from Elbow Lake to Crookston and other points down the valley would be, and then ponder as to what effect the building of such a line would have upon the business interests of the people all along down the valley. Remember, gentlemen and friends, that the "Soo" road has a surveyed line from Elbow Lake to Moorhead already, and Ada, Crookston, Warren, Hallock and St. Vincent, are more likely to be in its north bound direction than any other towns, especially if the people there show their friendliness instead of enmity. How absurd it is now, ain't it, for you to damn the Manitoba road in one breath, and bless it with the next?

The News, convicts the Sheaf of a grammatical error, but in so doing is led into one of far greater importance to the interests of this valley, when it claims that the great "Soo" line is of more importance to the valley than would be a direct short line to the head of navigation—Duluth. It is a fact that even brother Lamphere cannot deny that the nearer a water route the producer lives the more he can realize for his wheat, and the less he will have to pay for his incoming freights. Mr. Washburn's Soo road was built for the purpose of diverting our wheat, from its natural channel, over a long rail route to the east, via the Sault Ste Marie, making his interests to conflict with ours. We want a direct route to Duluth, this, not for the interest of the Soo system, therefore it is perfectly reasonable to suppose that Mr. W. will find some excuse to aid his own project in preference to ours. Mr. Sabin is known to be interested in obtaining for this country a short-line road to Duluth, to such an extent that he has already done much to obtain one. This being the case why should the people here go back on a man who has proved himself a strong, true friend, and support a man whose business interests lie in a totally different channel? The Sheaf reflects the sentiment of every person who understands the situation, in the valley, and, we believe of two-thirds of the republican voters of the state, in its support of Sabin. The News is in error again on the attitude of the Manitoba road. We know that as many favors has been extended the Washburn side as the other. There has never been any intimation of the building of the Soo line down this valley. When there is the News will not find this country backward in its support as one more adjunct of our progress, but if we could have but one of them the road to Duluth would be by far the most advantageous to the interests of this whole valley.

The Cost of Wheat Raising.

For Orange Judd Farmer, by a N. W. rambler.

Just what it costs to raise a bushel of wheat on fresh prairie soil is a very elastic figure, depending very much upon the season, quality of soil, and the way you set about it. I know cases in which the figures range, for work only from 15 cents to $1.00 a bushel. Some land owners find it most profitable to contract with a pushing man having say three or four sons all pulling one way and working with a will, and I think it a good way for all parties. I give examples of this method from two points nearly three hundred miles distant from each other, and perhaps some one else may contribute his share. In a country where, within a year or two, we may look for 100,000,000 bushels of the best hard wheat in the world, such details are of more than local interest. The first example is from Dickey County, Dak., and is nothing special as to yield, in fact, I know much better results that way, though in this man's case the absence of frost and the Old Hutch boom have made him for this season an exceptionally fortunate example. Samuel Glover says:

A DICKEY COUNTY EXPERIENCE.

I came here in the spring of 1885. The first season I hired 1,900 acres broken and backset, the next season 350 acres, and the next 100 acres more. Until this year I have had almost all of this land farmed on shares. I paid for breaking and backsetting, and leased it for one-half the grain at the threshing machine. I furnished seed and paid half of the threshing, the renter doing all the work.

The last year I farmed 920 acres in wheat, near Glover, in Dickey County, with the following result: Received 16,250 bushels wheat from 920 acres which I have sold as follows: 11,530 bushels No. 1 Hard at $1.15, $13,259.50; 3,827 bushels No. 1 Northern at $1.08, $4,133.16; 884 bushels No. 2 Northern at $1.00, $884.00; Total $18,276.66. Cost of production, including seed and hauling, $4,278.00; Net profit, $13,998.66; Average net per acre, $15.33.

A large portion of the land farmed on shares yielded as well as the above. I have had 1,900 acres cropped three years, 350 acres two years, and 100 acres one year, and my profits from farming this land, and all improvements including breaking and backsetting. Much of this land was poorly tilled and did not pay as well as if it had been properly farmed. Many of my neighbors can show better results per acre than I do.

ANOTHER GLOWING EXPERIENCE.

My next example is from the Portage Plains, the very choicest wheat land in Manitoba and nearly 300 miles due north of Dickey. This land is nearly flat, never luxuriant vegetation but full of mineral plant food, scarcely ever touched by frost in twenty years. It does not readily run to weeds and is full of staying power. Messrs. Campbell, who on this land have raised the very high average of 30 bushels per acre for five years in succession, finding they were too much engrossed in grain buying to attend properly to their crops, have hired their next season's crop to a good working farmer who with his family of grown-up sons is a model man for a new country. The land is all fall plowed in good shape and the seed applied. The contract is for 22½ cents per bushel and the work included is sowing, harrowing, harvesting, threshing, and delivering grain at the elevator, say three or four miles distant. This, I think a fairly good price for the renter, and with an average crop he will come out well, as he can start immediately after seeding to breaking on his own account, and will have every hour of his working time profitably employed. The ease of working and proximate certainty of a good crop are strong points in his favor, while the land owner from one crop will collect the price he paid for the land a few years ago. As I have already written, this is the sunny side of wheat farming. The man who has raised 500 or 1,000 acres of straw to burn, may now take the floor.

Cost of Railroad Construction.

The Western Rural.

Occasionally we come in contact with a conscientious railroad official. It is a pretty severe inference that will be drawn from that word occasionally, and we regret to believe that it is a proper one and that conscience does not play a very conspicuous part in railroad management. This man said to us that a road could be built and fully equipped for about what the simple cost of construction was usually estimated at. That is true, The Rural has often stated it. The estimated cost of constructing our railroads is immense. The ostensible cost of this construction, upon which the people pay dividends, is beyond all reason. The ordinary estimate is about $30,000 per mile, two or three times more than it ought to be. It has been known to run up pretty nearly to a hundred thousand dollars per mile in sections where there was no extra expense in construction. The modern proprietor of a railroad makes enough money in its construction to satisfy any reasonable greed. He organizes the railroad company; then he organizes himself into a construction company, and charges three or four prices for building the road; or he simply issues bonds and pockets two thousand dollars for every one thousand he constructs. Formerly he started at the very beginning to tap the generosity of the government, getting all the guaranty he could, all the cash available and all the public land that could be gobbled. Then he took subscriptions along the line of the road, and finally wound up by inducing the towns to bond themselves. By the time he got through with his enterprise there was nothing in sight that he did not own or have a lien upon. The road once constructed, and dead loads of watered stock were floated and added to as business increased and the public could be pinched to pay dividends.

In these days, however, the government is shy about helping railroads, the public is shy about subscribing and there is a general kick against high rates. To show, too, the character of the robbery that was practiced in railroad building in the past, some roads have been recently built without government aid and their owners were glad to have the opportunity to build them. The Northern Pacific was given about all the public land it wanted. A road in later years has been constructed parallel with the Union Pacific without an acre of public land, which sufficient to demonstrate that it was unnecessary for the government to aid the Northern Pacific. All these various extra expenses and burdens of railroad construction come upon the shoulders of the people. But the railroad people demand that nothing shall be done to injure the value of the enormous quantity of stock that represents three or four times the cost of construction and basketfuls of watered capital besides. The public says: "We are willing to pay you a profit upon the actual capital which your road represents." The roads say: "That is not satisfactory; we demand a profit upon millions of dollars of stock that represents nothing but clean cheek and dishonesty." The working of the Inter-State commerce law is in the direction of cutting down the value of this stock, which makes the railroad people squirm and should cause the people to rejoice.

Adapting the Farm to Stock.

The Prairie Farmer.

When selecting land the farmer should first of all turn his attention to an investigation of the various soils of which his farm is composed. These form the basis of all his future operations, and his success will depend in no small degree upon the skill with which he avails himself of the capabilities and adaptation of each. He should be familiar with their several characteristics, understand the various methods of improving them, and know to what crops each is best adapted, what they are capable of producing, and the manures which are most suitable to them.

The soil varies on nearly all farms to a certain extent, and no analysis can indicate the fertility of a large area by the examination of only a part. The texture also influences the condition, to say nothing of the subsoil, humidity and mineral composition. While a certain soil may be capable of producing a crop of wheat, corn or oats, yet it may be more suitable for some other crop not before grown upon it.

But, besides the growing of staple crops, stock-raising is greatly affected by the character of the soil. Some soils will make poor pastures and poor pastures make poor stock, no matter how careful the farmer may be. Inferior animals are the result of poor management and scanty supply of pasturage. Thus it seems that nature changes the form and habits of the animal in order to adapt itself to the condition under which it must exist. As man has been the agent in changing the character of our domestic animals, he must select a farm that is well adapted, or change its general character, that he may be able to render that assistance so essential to their well-being. The pasture, shelter and care must be suitable to progress, for no neglect can be allowed.

If the farm is under a poor system of cultivation, it will not be profitable to introduce improved stock upon it until the farmer gets it under a higher system of cultivation; for although man has adapted different animals to particular purposes, they are still subject to natural laws. The farm must not be made to do that to which it is not adapted, but the first step should be to consider the conditions existing in favor of improvement, and by careful management at first the farm may be enabled to do more, until finally it will be capable of fulfilling the highest expectations of the farmer.

Perhaps more failures have been made by attempting to improve stock under unfavorable conditions than from any other cause. There is nothing, however, to hinder any farmer in the matter of improvement, if he thoroughly understands the capacity of his farm, and will begin at the lower round of the ladder and steadily progress upward until the top round is reached. good stock is a sure sign of good farming, but inferior stock indicates inferiority in all departments, and the profits usually realized are in proportion to the degree of attention given both the stock and the farm.

In stocking the farm, the owner should begin with those breeds that are most suitable to the character of his farm. If he finds the breed which he has selected to be unprofitable, he should try another. Shorthorn cattle require fresh pastures for their greatest success. Rich, firm soils are more adapted to grasses and producing the best pastures. The lighter breeds will do well on light soils. The Southdown and Merino sheep will pay a fair profit on farms that would not support a flock of Cotswolds, as the latter are less active, and require better pasture. But one must not think a suitable farm all that is required for success in raising stock. The care that is taken, and the feeding, have much to do with it.

In feeding farm stock, it is not so much the great amount consumed as it is the quality and manner fed, that gives the best results. many are too prone to feed old and young, the milk cow and the ox, with the same kind of feed, and in many cases, the same quantity. One may feed the right kind of feed, but many times the quality is inferior, and gives poor results, and many times it is fed so carelessly that much of the feed is wasted. The margin for profit is quite narrow, and the farmer should feed, and otherwise manage economically, so that his business may be profitable.

The National Tribune
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Is one of the less than half-a-dozen really great family papers in the country.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Published at the National Capital.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Devoted to the history of the war.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Devoted to the interests of ex-soldiers and sailors.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
That makes a bold and persistent fight for their rights.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
That continually insists on justice being done the country's defenders.
It Has More Distinguished Contributors than Any Other Paper.

A Splendid 8-Page, 56-Column Paper.

Printed on fine paper, edited with signal ability and filled with the most interesting matter that can be procured.

ONLY $1 A YEAR—TWO CENTS A WEEK.

The National Tribune is the result of years of earnest, thoughtful effort, accompanied by a heavy expenditure of money, to build up at the Capital of the country which should be a welcome weekly visitor at every fireside from the Atlantic to the Pacific and champion effectively the cause of loyalty and good government, and of justice to the soldiers and sailors of the late war, their widows, children and dependent relatives. How well this has been done is best indicated by the wonderful success of the paper, which has attained popularity and circulation more rapidly than any other in the history of American journalism.

Features of the Paper.

The National Tribune makes a special feature of the history and reminiscences of the war for the preservation of the Nation. It publishes in fact the

of that gigantic struggle, for its history is not a warped and biased panegyric of some particular man or men, who are given credit for everything that succeeded. It is made up of the testimony of a multitude of witnesses, the plain, unvarnished stories of the men in every rank and degree who did the marching, digging and shooting and carried forward the war through all its various phases to a glorious success. The great value of the National Tribune's history is everywhere recognized, and its files are carefully preserved in every large library and historical collection in the country—North or South.

A fascinating story by Col. Thos. Knox, the brilliant writer of popular books, is now running in the paper.

An entertaining historical romance, by Frances Wilson (Fannie Williams), now appearing, is exciting great interest among the young folks with whom Miss Wilson has always been a great favorite.

John McElroy, who has written so much and so acceptably for the soldiers, will soon begin another war story.

Besides this it presents every week a splendid array of Editorials on Current Topics. Stories by the Best Authors—Wit, Humor and Information—Agricultural Notes of the Greatest Value—Household Hints and Suggestions—Synopsis of the News of the Week—Answers to Correspondent—Bright Miscellany, etc., which will interest, amuse and instruct every member of the family.

CROOKSTON, MINN., JANUARY 24, 1889.

Sheep in Dakota.

Pierre Free Press: I bought 274 wethers, ewes and late lambs in the fall of 1887, for $2.25 per head. The sheep were thin and in poor condition and I expected to lose fully 10 per cent. the first winter; but aside from seven killed by accident, I only lost ten, and I fed only prairie hay. The average clip last spring was 9¼ pounds of wool per head, giving a net profit of $225, after deducting all expenses of the flock, and I have besides, 80 very fine lambs. The flock is in a thriving condition, and has gone into winter in much better shape than a year ago. As my lambs would bring $2 each, that would make $160 which, added to the $225 profit on the wool, is a total very satisfactory for the first year's returns from a very indifferent flock. If I had started with a selected stock, of ewes alone, the profits would certainly have been larger than can be had from any other branch of farming. Of course, our grasses here beat the world, either for pasture or hay, and to that fact and the healthfulness of the climate is due our success. I think that a good flock of sheep on our cheap lands will make more money for their owner than can be obtained from the same investment in any other industry. Sheep seem to thrive from the day they arrive in Dakota, and in this climate, I don't see how any of the diseases so common to flocks elsewhere can prevail. Last winter was considered a hard one, but my sheep were out on the prairie feeding every day except through the severest storms.

Michigan Cattle Breeders.

The Western Rural.

At the late meeting of the Michigan Holstein-Friesian Cattle Breeders, Association, President Sweet in his address, among other things, said: The Holstein-Briesian breed has risen steadily and solidly in the estimation of cattle breeders in general. The competitions at fairs and dairy shows leave us in better standing than ever, and the new names coming continually into prominence as phenomenal milkers or butter-makers prove that we are here to stay. Our Holstein-Friesians are now widely distributed in this country. First, we hear of a cow in New York which has greatly distinguished herself then another in Iowa, another in Illinois, and so on over again, through the list of the states, forwards and backwards, all along the line we hear of these animals continually, until what was formerly considered a great effort excites no particular attention. Animals from widely separated heards, not related, and from obscure or little known strains of blood, testify that the great productive qualities of the Holstein-Friesians are characteristic of the breed as a whole, and not confined to individuals of a single family or strain. This is a very good point indeed, and I confess to receiving surprises from some of my cows whose pedigrees prior to importation are unknown to me, and whose performances were not exactly looked for or expected. We are now well protected in Michigan as regards cattle diseases. The laws are well enforced, and we have not suffered from any outbreaks of contagious diseases, either in our own heards or from cattle in transit in other States. The expected stimulus to dairy interests from the passage of national laws regulating the sale of imitation butter has been checked by poor pasturage, and resultant shortage of feed. This condition has depressed the cattle interests of Michigan for two seasons and led us to look for a remedy. I think we have solved the problem by growing corn for ensilage, and so maintaining a larger herd on fewer acres, than under the old system of raising hay. Under the old system a poor hay crop meant a closing out of all the cattle that could be worked off, and a depression in the trade until it could be determined what the next season's crop was going to be. It is a very poor season indeed that will not grow corn sufficient for ensilage, and I cannot scarcely recall such a condition. My experience with poor pasture, and the limited acreage of my farm, led me to experiment with the higher modes of cultivation, so I now have about 500 tons of ensilage put away, and feed quite independent of the hay. Our Michigan farms are usually small and the land comparatively dear, but with the silo, and a good market in our neighborhood for our butter, cheese and beef, I think we are as well off as our brethren farther west, with their abundant pasturage and cheap hay. At present there is a depression in blooded cattle interests. Crop failures have had much to do with this condition, and I believe that those who have faith in the future will come out all right, and reap the profits of the reaction which is sure to follow a period of depression.

Mr. T. D. Seeley presented a paper on Holstein-Friesian pedigrees, and we publish some of Mr. Seeley's thoughts. He said: As a necessity in breeding, a correct understading of the pedigrees of our foundation stock and the animals used as breeders in our herds, is secondary only to the ability to judge animals individually. It is not our knowledge of the names, herd book numbers, etc., from which we derive our benefit, but rather an acquaintance with the animals themselves, that enter into the pedigrees in our herds. We may better know from whence each animal derives its desirable qualities and in this knowledge we find a great help, almost a solution of the problems of how the undesirable qualities may be obliterated, and the desirable retained in future generations. Reputation in pedigree is valuable only in an advertising sense. The appearance at the head of a pedigree of the name of some noted breeder, followed by the putting together of familiar names, is but too often mistaken for evidence of an excellent lineage, and we find ourselves commending a pedigree of which we know nothing as to its real value, never, perhaps, stopping to inquire if the reputation of the breeder was gained by the excellence of his cattle, or the reputation of the cattle gained by the business capacity of the man; or, if the cattle have gained their own reputation, was it by the possession of such qualities as we wish to propagate? An animal may become famous the world over by winning prizes as a beef animal, yet his use in a herd of dairy cattle might undo all that had been accomplished in years of careful breeding for dairy qulities.

Pedigrees are only valuable for the animals they produce. Hence a good pedigree and a poor individual is a combination that does not exist. The excuse so often made for the use of a poor individual, i. e., that he is well bred, is inexcusable. The old Scotch adage, "A gude goose may hae an ill gaisling," always brings to mind recollections of disappointment in breeding. It may be perhaps the disappointment we felt when we first milked the heifer of which so much had been expected on account of the performance of her dam; or, perhaps it recalls how the calf we had selected to succeed his sire at the head of the herd grew up. With each recurrence our faith in pedigrees is severely shaken, and we are led to inquire if like really dose produce like, or the likeness of some ancestor. We may find reasons for some cases of this kind in the fact that animals coupled did not nick, or in some external cause. But fully as often our calf in question partakes of the qualities of some ancestor, either near or remote. We should therefore understand more than the first few crosses, and it is here that Holstein-Friesian breeders find a difficulty hard to surmount. The fact that numbers of our herds trace to bull of breeder on one side and cow of breeder on the other, gives but little food for the pedigree student's mind to digest, and is a poor foundation to build upon.

We are too often disappointed in our stock bulls, for what we term a lack of prepotency. I account for this partly from the fact that there are so many different types of breed and that they have been so promiscuously coupled. It is a fact reasonable enough that the result of an outcross, being sort of a compromise between the two types, should not be as prepotent as an animal the result of combined efforts of a similar sire and dam, to reproduce the one type to which they belong. In the one case the efforts to the sire and dam to reproduce themselves are in direct opposition to each other. The resultant offspring is an uncertainty, sometimes partaking of the qualitics of the sire, sometimes of the dam, usually of both. Such an animal, an uncertainty himself, would not be expected to impress with any great regularity his own qualities upon his offspring. But as in the animal bred from similar sire and dam, there is but one effort put forth to reproduce the type to which the parent belong, it is but natural that his powers of transmission or prepotency should be intensified. From this I believe that the result of a violent outcross should never be depended upon as a sire, except perhaps in the founding of a new type or race, and then it is preferable that it be followed by in-breeding, or one or two crosses. There are many little things to avoid in pedigree. Always avoid a pedigree that traces to starvation. It will produce an animal with limited capacity, with an ability to turn it to good account. In the matter of color we all have legitimate preferences which may govern us in our choice of pedigree, but never should we let ourselves be carried away by a color craze. We must recognize merit whether under a hide where either white or black predominates, so long as the color does not indicate impurity of breeding. A good cow, like a good horse, is never a bad color.

Farm Waste.

The Prairie Farmer.

In a former article I had something to say of farm waste, and, as the field is a broad one, there is much yet that may be said with profit to many farmers. Before, I dwelt on the waste that follows from keeping roguish stock and poor fences. Another almost as great a source of waste results from the lack of proper winter shelter for the dumb brutes and proper arrangements for feeding. It is an undoubted fact that it requires food to supply warmth, and very naturally it follows that the less stock are exposed to cold, the less povender it will require to keep them in good living order. But, how many farmers there are who disregard this truth, and go on year after year, without making any provisions whatever for the protection of their cattle and horses from the rude buffetings of the elements.

A person cannot travel a day's journey anywhere in this country, even on the coldest and stormiest day of winter, without seeing cows and horses humped up in fence-corners, shaking with cold and damp. This is not only cruel and a sin against dumb brutes, but it is unprofitable and a great waste. Stock left out thus exposed to rain, snow, winds and cold, and forced to seek a bed on the frozen ground, or in the mud, cannot be expected to thrive and command a good price in the markets. Often milk cows are left unprotected through the entire winter, and, as a natural consequence, they fail of their milk. How much better and cheeper it would be to keep one good cow, and shelter, bed and feed her well, than to keep three or four without care. The one thus cared for would be of more profit and less expense and truble. than the three or four left to seek shelter behind the fences and embankment. The one cow would be a great deal less expensive, from the fact that with good, warm shelter she would keep fat and to her milk on the feed that it would require to keep an exposed cow alive.

Again, feed properly put out is a great saving. With many farmers it is a common practice to throw fodder, hay or oats out on the ground for the stock to run over and tramp into the mud. In this way half of the feed is lost. It is neither expensive nor difficult to arrange feed-pens or racks, either one of which will save enough feed in a few days to pay for the trouble and expense of its construction. How often do we see a drove of hogs confined in a narrow, muddy pen, receiving their daily allowance of corn in a loblolly of mud and water. Half of the corn thus fed out is wasted, and besides it is impossible for a hog to fatten under such conditions. There should be a perfect system in the care of stock. It is better to keep a great deal less of it, and keep that little well.

Shelters can be easly and cheaply constructed, and a great many do construct them. A few day's work will suffice for the erection of the framework of a shed. Then when wheat-threshing time comes, how easy and inexpensive it is to throw the straw back for a north wall and a covering. The result is a roomy shelter that is both warm and strong, and can be kept up for years with no expence and little labor.

Some people may say that they have so much stock that they cannot afford shelter for it all. Then, if you have, you had better sell them to somebody who can afford it. It will pay you to do so. There is no more practical ease in trying to winter stock without proper quarters, than there would be in trying to keep boarders without rooms for them to sleep in. The successful farmer, the man who makes the money, is one who keeps good stock, and cares for it properly. He does not overtax his resources, and you do not see his fence-corners turned into shelters by a great drove of hungry, cold cows and horses.

THOMAS P. MONTFORT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk,—ss.
In Probate Court.

In the matter of the estate of Martin Johnson deceased.

On reading and filing the petition of Johane M. Johnson, of Crookston, Polk County, Minnesota, representing, among other things, that Martin Johnson, late of Crookston, in said Polk County, on the 7th day of January A. D. 1889, at Crookston aforesaid died intestate, and being a resident of this county at the time of his death, leaving goods, chattels and estate within this county, and that said petitioner is the widow of said deceased, and praying that administration of said estate be to John H. Locken granted.

It is ordered, that said petition be heard before the judge of this court, on Monday the 11th day of February A. D. 1889, at 10 o'clock a. m., at the probate office, in Crookston, in said county.

Ordered further, that notice thereof be given to the heirs of said deceased and to all persons interested, by publishing a copy of this order for three successive weeks prior to said day of hearing, in THE POLK COUNTY JOURNAL a weekly newspaper printed and published at Crookston in said county.

Dated at Crookston the 14th day of January A. D. 1889.

By the court,
C. O. CHRISTIANSON,
Judge of Probate.

A. D. STEPHENS,

From the January report of the Experimental farm we take the following:

EXPERIMENT STATION OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA,

ST. ANTHONY PARK, Jan. 2, 1889.

To His Excellency Governor A. R. McGill, of Minnesota:

DEAR SIR:—At your request, and with the permission of the Regents of the University, I made a trip to the Red River Valley, to investigate the condition of the wheat crop and to collect specimens for study and experiment.

Knowing that in many parts of the state the wheat rust was fully as much the cause for the poor crops as the frost, I first visited Fergus Falls, in Otter Tail County, with the view of obtaining specimens of wheat undoubtedly injured by rust, and not by frost. Specimens there collected will serve a good purpose by comparing them with frosted ones. The damage in that county by frost is but very slight, as nearly all the cereals harvested were either ripe enough not to be affected by it, or were already stacked. During the summer I had carefully observed the wheat rust in that county, and its very rapid spread, which was caused by a series of very warm and sultry days.

Reaching Crookston, in Polk County, I found the injury to wheat very much greater than first suspected, and almost 85 per cent, of the whole crop destroyed or worthless. In fact, upon many farms the wheat was so much damaged, that it did not pay to cut it, and the plants were plowed under or burned The cause of this injury was not frost alone, but a combination of it with rust, the latter disease weakening the plants to such an extent that even a slight frost—otherwise harmless—would kill the plant. A series of sultry and hot days during the growing season favoring the disease, it had caused fully as much damage as the frost. The seasons last year were also very abnormal for the region injured by rust and frost. The usual time for sowing wheat is from April 20 to May 10. Last spring the farmers had to sow their wheat at three different times, about one week apart, because they were interrupted in their work by heavy rains. The crops from the first two sowings were a total loss; the plants were weakened by too much moisture, followed by intense heat, both greatly favoring the growth of the parasitic rust. The plants produced from the latest sowing promised well, and the berries were to all appearance well filled, although leaves and stems were badly covered with rust. But after the first slight frost, on August 7, just heavy enough to blacken the vines of cucumbers but not killing them, grave fears were already entertained as to its effect upon the grain. The heavier frost of August 14 to 17 killed the previously very much weakened plants; and the berries, although plump, would, when squeezed, show no milk, but water. When the wheat was cut and put in stacks, a very strong odor of acid or vinegar would soon become noticeable in their vicinity, indicating that the berries underwent a fermention. Such berries shrank to almost nothing, and form now a large percentage of the entire crop. Riper berries, containing less water, were not killed by the frost, although they have a very shrunken or blistered appearance, and are unfit for both milling and feeding purposes, as nearly the whole amount of starch and gluten is absorbed by the rust, or decomposed by the frost. Hogs fed with such food will not fatten, and in reality do not eat the grains unless forced to do so by hunger. The injury to the crops is rather uniform. Plants upon certain kinds of soil fared somewhat better, and such exceptions can be readily explained. Wheat growing upon a more sandy soil, and consequently upon ground better drained and free of excessive moisture, riened its berries in time. Naturally such plants were also less affected by the rust, and not so much weakened by this parasite as others growing upon rich and moist soil. Wherever air had free access to the individual plants the moisture could evaporate more rapidly, and rust did no great injury. Such was the case upon sandy soil and along the edges of fields. But wherever there was a rank growth; shaded the rich soil, evaporation was slow and the rust had full sway. At Crookston, rust and frost combined caused the damage; without rust, however, it would have been very much less.

Proceeding to Hallock, in Kittson County, a similiar state of affairs was found to exist. But little trouble had been experienced by farmers at seeding time, yet the frequent moist and very warm days were also injurious to the plants, while very favorable to the increase and rapid spread of the rust; a combination of both rust and frost injured the wheat crop to such an extent that in many cases it would not pay to harvest it, and consequently the plants were either plowed under or burned.

The farmers who lost their crops in these counties are in a very deplorable condition. Although perhaps 50 per cent. of tqe grain harvested will germinate, it is more than doubtful that they will ever produce healthy plants. The stored-up food contained in the seeds is so little that the young plant very likely will starve before they are able to absorb mineral food from the soil, and only in a very exceptionally favorable spring is there a hope that plants from such poor seeds will grow strong enough to reproduce. But no sensible farmer will willingly run such a risk, and consequently he must procure better seed. It is indeed a gloomy state of affairs, as those farmers who have lost their entire crop have not the means to buy seed wheat, and they will be compelled to abandon their farms if not assisted. As the only crop that is successfully grown in the region affected by rust and frost is wheat, farmers have no alternative but to choose between leaving their farms or securing seeds. No doubt it is the duty of the state to assist its citizens, and protect at the same time, its own interests, not by donating the seed, but by selling it to them at cost and upon credit. The introduction of seed from other regions would produce other beneficial results, not necessary to mention in this connection.

Numerous specimens of wheat, more or less injured by rust and frost, were collected during the trip, and all will be carefully investigated at the Experimental station.

Trusting that the outcome of such experiments may not be alone of interest, but of practical value to the farmers, and thanking you for the constant kindness shown me, I remain.

Yours very respectfully,

OTTO LEGGER,
Entomologist and Botanist.

Relations of Farmers to Other Classes.

EDITORS WESTERN RURAL:—The relations of all men and women of the nation in the only true sense, are mutual, reciprocal and indivisible. For are we not all of one flesh? endowed with the same physiology, the same anatomy, the same faculties of mind, and governed by the same laws, physical and mental? This is evidence of the natural equality of all and indicates that the maintenance of this equality is the cardinal principle of right living! and hence, the widespread violations of this principle, seen in the antagonisms of classes and pursuits, is prima facia evidence of man's deviation from his normal condition or the rational application of knowledge to the well-being of mankind. The great objects of life are unquestionably health and happiness, but unhappily the prime objects are defeated in part by the pugiistics attitude of classes whose interests, financially, supposed to conflict. The whole business simmered down and purified in the alembic of reason, brings to light the truth that human selfishness is the chief root of the tree of evil, and the insane scramble to gratify it the chief cause of the troubles between nations, classes and individuals. Man made laws, through their liability to err, and grafting his mind with sprouts of cussedness, are not always for the best good of the governed; and the insane education that prompts him to accumulate useless piles of wealth, intensifies the evil, aggravating the imaginary conflict between the pursuits and in the outcome creating dissatisfied paupers and storing up vast quantities of money that bursts forth like a volcano destroying the weak and defenceless in its course. This selfishness with the backing to insure its success has been concentrated in the few and their power over legislation, judges, jurors, and the ballot-box enables them to empty the purses of farmers and laborers and appeals and protestation are thrown away on these vampires of evil. The science of socialogy is ignored, equality is obsolete, the happiness of man is only for the few; while the many are made to play slaves to their demands and suffer the consequences of outraged natural laws and die, paupers to the greed of gold, in their master's hands. The various callings of men ought on every principle of justice to earn a percentage of their labor as may be in a ratio of the natural risks run. Capital invested we are inclined to believe should not receive anything; but the fruits of the labor growing out of its use, according to risks should receive its full share, and being a day laborer or a farmer should not exclude them from their just dues. For instance, a merchant has ten thousand dollars invested in goods and a farmer ten thousand in farming. As things are going the merchant makes at least ten per cent, while the farmer makes three. The question—is this an equal distribution as between farmer and merchant! But the merchant on some things makes fifty or even one hundred per cent, the farmer certainly not half of this on anything. Is this on a square? The merchant fixes his own price, while the farmer has the prices of what he has to sell fixed for him. It is an old saying, "It takes two to make a bargain," but we submit that a compulsory bargain on one side is no bargain at all; it is simple unadulterated robbery when the price offered is below the value of the labor required to produce it. Right here is a joint out that requires surgical manipulation. Things are not sold according to their value, but for the price they can be sold for, and the money power having hold of the lever of power, fixes the price of proportion to cost, the ability of the seller to stand, and consequently labor is defrauded or robbed of its just dues, the poor made to suffer and their numbers immensely increased. Instead of universal prosperity, general poverty is fast increasing and as an inevitable consequence disaffection, disturbance and anarchy are making rapid strides towards bloodshed, destruction of property and national disintegration. The national governm ent is blind as a mole, because the cataract of gold obscures the lens of their moral sight, and they plunge headlong into the malarial swamps of evil, heedless of consequences to the people and the stability of national life. The millionaire is a thousand fold worse than an honest laboring man not worth a dollar, for one has the means of being useful, but uses the means to increase poverty and degradation. The relations of man to man are almost entirely ignored; honesty is fast becoming a thing of the past in this republic, and power, with its accompanying tyranny, is crushing the spirit that would willingly live in harmony with honest law; the mutual relations inherent in human nature now degenerated into unholy oppression.

Our relations to the boards of trade and railroad extortioners are those of innocent persons having something which they want, and with pistols to our heads, we are forced to turn out to them as much as they demand, and they would demand all, but they know the goose is an annual layer, and so in mercy prompted by self interest, they only take what they think we can stand, and still lay more golden eggs for their benefit. Properly speaking, we hold no natural relations ts the board of trade; therefore, law should subject them to fine and imprisonment for their many crimes perpetrated against innocent parties, the prosperity and happiness of the people. Banks were ostensibly established for the benefit of money borrowers, but really for the especial benefit of bankers, and hence our relations to bankers are about as useful to us as rattlesnakes are to their victims, which means there are no rational or useful relations between us, and therefore banking is an illegitimate and infamous business which in its present abnormal relation to society should not exist. To correct the evils of our diversified relations and bring all to one common level as near as possible will require the excision of the diseased excrescences of the body politic, much thought, perseverance and patience, but we believe with organized unity of purpose very much may be done in the way of renovations, and the abolition of unjust laws, the certain and speedy punishment of the violators of law. The appointment of twenty men noted for honesty, unswerving integrity and devotion to the interests of the whole people, sitting with closed doors for the space of one year, might elaborate a system of laws vastly more in sympathy with the true interests of all classes, and the abolition of all laws that now burden the people with injustice.

The result of their labors to be submitted to a vote of the people, and if carried, be enacted into laws by Congress and State Legislatures. In the meantime everything that can be done to enlighten the people and indoctrinate the minds of our youth with the true objects of life as applied to the people at large. The Grange, Alliance, Wheel, Knights of Labor, etc., should work in harmony and with a will, that voters may fully understand the value of the ballot and the mighty interests to their children which hinges on its wise use. There will be found a way to consolidate the interests of all legitimate business. Do not despair, but look with hopeful eyes, act in honesty of purpose, and many of the great evils will be removed, the poor and suffering be elevated, and crime speedily receive its dues.

R. K. SLOSSON.

Trust in Binding Twine.

Western Rural.

The spirit of infernal greed is widening and deepening and becoming more intense because the people are not more active in protecting their rights. All trusts affect us more or less, but some come nearer to, and are heavier upon some classes than others. It is now certain that there will be a great lift in the price of binding twine this coming summer. There is to be a trust. The tendency has been in this direction for some time, and twine has been so extortionately high that it was hoped that the twine people would show enough decensy to at least stop at the point of plunder which they had already reached. It looks now as if the price of twine would be fifty per cent higher next harvest than it ought to be. What shall be done? We can break the back of that trust in short order if we will go at the work heroically and The Rural proposes that we do. Mr. L. G. Knilfen writes us detailing a plan which we heartily second. It is to cut our grain with our harvesters and use a sheaf carrier, dumping our grain loose in windrows, then stacking the grain loose. Millions of dollars are locked up in the binding twine business, and just one season of this sort of work upon our part will pretty near wreck the whole business and it will be millions of dollars in the pockets of our farmers, if they will now go to work to break this trust.

Who will agree to refuse to use binding twine the coming harvest? Who will embrace this splendid opportunity to show our power to protect ourselves and to teach greed a lesson that it will remember while time lasts? Will those who will agree to cut their grain in this way unless twine is furnished for twelve cents at most, send their names to the Rural? It would be a good plan, too, to sign some such agreement as the following and post it up in public places in your town:

"We, the undersigned, farmers, believing in justice and equity and seeing that a trust is formed for the purpose of exacting from us about double the value of binding twine for the harvest of 1889, agree to cut our grain with our harvesters and use a sheaf carrier and dump the grain loose in windrows without binding and stack the straw loose, unless the syndicate is broken and twine furnished at a price not to exceed twelve cents a pound."

Let us hear from you, wheat growers. We can really rejoice in the opportunity of smashing a trust. We can rejoice in the opportunity of making a little sacrifice to teach the grasping spirit of the times a needed lesson. We can lose nothing, for we cannot afford to pay twenty cents a pound for twine. That is certain. Will other agricultural papers take the matter up, without reference to the Rural at all, and help to push a soulless syndicate, that is plotting to despoil our farmers, to the wall? Let us all stand together for once, brethren, in defense of the farmer's interests. Bring this subject to the attention of your Alliance and your Grange, and leave nothing undone to create a cyclone of opposition to the plundering scheme. The Rural will be glad to receive on a postal card the names of those farmers who will enlist in the cause of their own protection.

The Legislatures.

Western Rural.

Those legislatures that were elected last fall are now in session in the various states, and the mill has begun to grind. The expense of maintaining legislatures is very great, and in all decency and honor the members should address themselves to the work of honestly serving their constituencies. The questions of most importance to the people are common to all the states. The matter of regulating railroad charges, of handling trusts, of preventing food adulteration, of reaching the tax shirkers, and the better government of cities, needs attention from every legislature. So far as the railroads are concerned, if the state legislatures would do their duty in the matter of regulating charges, it would aid the inter-state commerce law greatly. That law does not apply to charges within a state. Nothing but state legislation can affect that. As to food adulteration it would seem as if everybody should be interested in preventing that. The farmer demands the prohibition of the wrong because it is an injustice to him, but it is just as great an injustice to the consumer as it is to the producer. In this connection we desire again to call the attention of legislators to the fact that while we have an oleomargarine law that provides that the stuff shall be sold under its proper name, there is no law to prevent hotel, boarding house and restaurant keepers from palming it off upon their customers for genuine butter. Most of the present consumption of bogus butter is through these channels, and until these people are compelled to give the patron notice that he is being served with butterine, when that is the case, butterine is being sold to thousands in defiance of the spirit of the oleomargarine law. Let us have state laws that will put a stop to the fraud.

The tax question will always be an important one until there is some system adopted by which there shall be more equitable assessm ent. The farmers are greatly interested in this subject for they pay most of the taxes, while the people and property that require a hundred times more protection than the farmer and his property require, pay comparatively very little in thousands of cases. We have always believed that a graduated income tax was the easiest road out of our present tax muddle. That would enable the tax payer to get rid of paying taxes upon both what he owned and what he owed, and the amount of income could be got at with somewhat more accuracy than the value and location of a great deal of taxable property can. But if the present system is to be maintained then some steps should be taken to insure a full valuation of all property, and wherever the laws permit of the assessment of what a man owes, the wrong should be corrected. If a man owes an eight thousand dollar mortgage upon a ten thousand dollar farm there is no justice or sense in taxing him for more than two thousand dollars. That is all he owns, and he may hold that by an exceedingly light grip.

There is no trouble in seeing the injustice of some of our laws, and legislators are elected to reform such evils, and should be held responsible if they neglect to do so. The tendency of the times is toward the institution of reforms, and the legislature of every state should recognize the fact.

Care of the Dairy Cow.

SEASONABLE NOTES ON CAUSES OF ABORTON; PREVENTION, AND FENERAL MANAGEMENT.

Orange Judd Farmer.

More accidents happen to the dairy cow during the first four months of the year than during the other eight. The wise breeder does not wait until his animals are unwell before he takes measures to provide for their comfort. He prevents disease and accidents and keeps an eye upon to the causes, removing them as rapidly as they appear, all of which results in his gain. The accidents most common to the pregnant animal are abortion, from many different causes, and difficult parturition. Both are quite common in some herds, but may be prevented to a greater or less extent. The causes are various, and may be gleaned from the follwing

CONDITION TO BE CONSIDERED:

In the first place, the animal is nourishing two individuals, and to do this in the best possible manner, must have proper food in proper quantities. If this is not supplied, the vital functions will be more or less impaired, making it easy for disease to enter, or accidents to terminate unfavorably. This, combined with proper exercise moderate in amount, is the best guard against the "bad luck" so often quoted. In other words, "bad luck" is in nine cases out of ten nothing more or less than simply bad management, either in feeding or handling the animals. Nourishment being attended to in the form of solid food, the water, so intimately connected with it must be considered. Where for some cause the constitution of a pregnant animal has been rendered out of harmony with nature, it quite often happens that a large draught of cold water causes her to abort. Not less does a current of cold air, or a cold stable cause the trouble. Upon the other hand, an animal kept in a is apt to suffer severely when turned out into the damp, cold weather of winter. Another quite common cause is icy or wet ground or floors, where the animal can not secure a good foothold. This may be remedied by scattering ashes over these places, by using an old ax to roughen the surface, or by simply scattering on fresh manure. If the ground is icy this will freeze tight making the yard quite navigable. The causes so far mentioned are all controllable to a great extent, and the accidents resulting from them may, in the majority of cases, be avoided. There are others less controllable such as injuries received from other animals, or animals of a nervous temperament forgetting themselves and receiving injuries in various ways.

MANAGEMENT OF THE HERD IN GENERAL.

Having taken into consideration the points mentioned and studied the thousand and one additional ones, there still remains a very important feature to be considered in the division of the herd. Here lies a great item amounting in the strength and health of the offspring as well as in the dam to considerable more than is commonly given credit. Pregnant animals should by all means be kept in a separate lot, away from all farrow cows, steers or younger animals. The cow at this period wants to be left alone just as much as when she is giving her greatest flow of milk. She is just as much at work, and how much more necessary that she should not be irritated while transforming the elements into new life than while simply transmitting them into milk. Then look well to the pregnant animal. Care for her as above outlined, even at this early date, and after she passes the critical period you will be repaid an hundred fold.

Hoard's Dairyman: What ails a very large per cent. of the "mixed" and "general purpose" farming of the land, is, that such farmers are trying to get the crops off of 100 acres of land, that ought to be made to grow on 40 acres; and what ails the awfully "mixed" and "general purpose" dairying of the land is, that so-called dairymen, are trying to get the butter out of 2½ caseine-fed cows that one good butter cow will produce. There will be "famine" on that farm so long as such farming prevails the same as there was in the personal exchequer of the Prodigal Son, after his capital was gone, and no income in sight; and it is minus beside, the "fun he had with the boys," while his patrimony was going.

Hoard's Dairyman.

In our way of thinking Bro. Montgomery of the Starkville, (Miss.) Southern Live Stock Journal is doing more to usher in the millennium of civilization, by striking valiant blows in behalf of intelligent dairying and good farming on southern soil, than all the politicians south of the Ohio River. He talks "like a father in Israel" to them in this way:

"The manner in which the majority of our people attempt to farm is an insult to agriculture, and a disgrace to us as intelligent beings. If the farm fails to support us and to earn us a profit besides, the fault is not with the land, or the season, or the "nigger," or the civil war, or the republican party, or the climate, or the yellow fever, or the insects—the fault is our own.

We are headstrong in the pursuance of old beaten tracks; we are extravagant because we do not understand practically what really constitutes true economy; we are non-progressive—do not keep up with the car of progress in matters of agriculture; we are too fond of dirty politics and neglect our farming interests to take personal part in trival and questionable political matters; instead of trying to train the ignorant negroes to practice a better and more intelligent system of agriculture, we curse them as a set of worthless brutes, and set them ourselves a most miserable example of worthlessness—we who ought to be teachers, and models for them to imitate; but comparatively few subscribe for and read agricultural papers, or books, and fewer still try to proctice the good things that they read; we buy our meat in the west, and make those people rich at our expense; our work stock ditto; most of our butter, all of our cheese, most of our lard, most of our canned fruits and vegetables, a large share of our corn and oats and rye, even most of our Irish potatoes, apples, dried fruits and a hundred other other agricultural products that could be raised here cheaper than elsewhere, we buy from the north and west. Is it any wonder we are poor? Honestly, is it not just and right that a people so unwise in their methods and practices should be poor? As a farming people, we certainly do very little to condemn us to sympathy. Have we no pride? Have we no ambition? Are we to remain ignorant, and bull-headed, and slovenly for all time?"

If the south could swap its gasconading, bull-dozing politicians, for a Jersey calf each, she would make a good trade.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., JANUARY 31, 1889.

'Round Home.

Salmagundi Club to-morrow evening.

Al. Newlan took the St. Vincent run on Monday.

W. F. Zwickey was up from the capital last week.

J. O. Milne returned from St. Paul Tuesday morning.

Dr. Bridgman, of Hamline University, was in the city over Sunday.

The Superintendent's car passed through the city Monday afternoon.

Freddie Lusian has been confined to his bed with sickness for a number of days.

Examination for state certificates are being held in the Central school this week.

R. Smith and family, of the Fifth ward, have been in St. Paul for a week's visit.

O'Connor took a run over to the Forks Monday afternoon, returning on the evening train.

J. N. Bailey has been on the list of sick ones during the past week, but is about again.

Berthiaume Bros. shipped their household goods, on Saturday, to Superior, where they are to settle in business.

John Chilbeck was in from his farm ten miles southwest of town, a few nights ago, after Mike Leguee, to attend a sick horse.

Miss Ayers has been seriously sick for a number of days with some throat affection, fortunately not of a diphtheric nature.

Miss Agnes McClelland writes from the Normal at St. Cloud, that she is doing well and enjoys her surroundings very much.

The city hack found employment during the blizzard, at the school house, as the teachers found the day unfavorable for walking.

The Lutheran Conference church are happy in the ownership of a $75 chandelier, which is a beauty, and one of the largest in the Northwest.

Rev. O. Wierson, of St. Paul, is conducting revival meetings this week in the Scandinavian Methodist church. He will remain over Sunday.

On Friday morning Sheriff Paulsrud delivered Dr. Brown into the custody of the Montana official, who had secured requisition papers from the governor.

Friday's blizzard, although of short duration, was unusually wild. One man is reported to have been blown from a car platform of a train on the Minot division.

Ed. Gates has charge of the Crookston yards nights. Ed. is an old railroader, and is capable of filling any position the company should choose to offer him.

The party given by the Ivy Club, at McKinnon Hall, last Thursday evening was the most brilliant social affair of the season. Seventy guests were present and all report a good time.

Miss Tempe E. Griffith, of this city, accompanied Dr. Bridgman, Sunday night, on his return to Hamline, where she will pursue a musical and classical course of study in the university.

Al. Newland, who has been on the express delivery wagon during the past season, has been appointed express messenger on the St. Hilaire division. Chas. McKay takes his place on the delivery.

Last week, one of the boys in the employ of a prominent hotel of the city, having been victimized on two successive nights by sneak thieves, expressed an intention of concealing himself in the hotel safe the next night, lest the greedy party run off with him bodily.

The Crookston Furniture Co., have fitted up a room in the rear of their store expressly for the exhibition of their fine line of coffins, caskets, robes and trimmings. Special attention given to this branch of their business. Embalming in all its details a specialty. Our prices are lower than any other house west of Chicago. Satisfactory services guaranteed.

A young man came up from the south, last week, who a short time since had started for the east with sixty dollars in his pocket. Stopping over at Mandan, he was approached by a crook who gained his confidence to the extent that he was beguiled into giving him a supper and a share of his bed at the hotel. Awaking in the night, our friend found himself alone, and investigation brought to light the unpleasant fact that he was not only alone but without funds, his friend having left nothing but another victim of his class. Charity given to needy persons is commendable, but a man should not leave his purse where it can be had for the taking when a total stranger is sharing his bed. It is too often a man who appears a good fellow is in reality a wolf done up in a sheep's skin.

News of the death of the little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. Churchill, is received. This sad event for the young parents recalls a similar event which occurred in this city ten years ago—the death of Mrs. Churchill's sister aged two years and one month. Both of these children died of diphtheria, the one Jan. 1st 1879 the other Jan. 6th 1889. We find in our files of former date the following verses, composed by Mrs. Julia C. Carruth:

Tiny fingers folded
O'er the quiet breast,
Form in beauty molded
Lying still—at rest.

Seems our Darling Baby
In her deep repose,
Whiter than the lily;
Purer than the rose.

Ere the tender feet,
Wearied on the way;
Ere the little hands,
Forgot their winsome play;

Ere the little heart
Grew hard, and sad, and sore,
BABY REJOINED THE ANGELS;
Life's fitful journey o'er.

Supt. Elliot is in St. Paul on a brief business visit.

O. H. Lucken took in the State Encampment, G. A. R., in St. Paul, last week.

St. Hilaire's pedagogue, Demming, came down this week for a visit with his numerous friends.

O. Sargent has one of the finest double sleighs in the city—just the thing to take the whole family to church.

There will be no service in Christ Church next Sunday. The rector has been called away to Montreal and wont return until next week.

Owing to the inclemency of the weather the social arranged for Friday evening at the residence of J. W. Wheeler, was postponed indefinitely.

The social in connection with Christ Church, which was to come off this evening, has been postponed owing to the absence of the Rector, I. C. Fortin.

The meeting in the Baptist church, last Monday evening, was one of unusual solemnity and power. Much deep feeling was manifested and several rose for prayers.

St. Paul Dispatch: The Duluth & Winnipeg railroad is now enabled to receive its patents for land earned under grants to it, the injunction against it having been dissolved.

Farm loans completed and money paid over the day application is made.
STEENERSON & McMANUS.

Editor E. H. Love, of Hallock, was in the city Sunday. On Monday he purchased Barber's horse, "Star Bashaw," and departed for home on Tuesday, well satisfied with his trip to the Queen City.

Wilfred Farley, Hack & Gallasch's popular dry goods salesman, started Tuesday night for St. Paul, where he will visit some time before proceeding to Montreal. He will return in about six weeks.

The Berthiaume Bros., took their departure this week for their new home at West Superior, Wis., accompanied by the best wishes of hosts of friends. They have the best wishes of THE JOURNAL for their future success.

The "Boys in Blue," gathered in Market Hall, St. Paul, during the State Encampment, were thrilled through and through when Pete Hoffman, who for years enjoyed the enviable reputation of being the best snare drummer west of the Mississippi, rolled the drum that he carried into the first battle of Bull Run, as he gave the beat for the Old First Minnesota, and which he carried through the war. Pete is getting to be an old man, having served as a drummer boy in the Mexican war under Gen. Scott. He is now residing at Sauk Centre.

We have only one note and mortgage we make a loan the day applied for, charge no bonus, and make interest payable at our office in Crookston.
STEENERSON & McMANUS.

The committee appointed to look into the matter of offering inducements to other roads to build into Crookston was invited to a conference with the Manitoba authorities and went to St. Paul last week for that purpose. Mr. Hill was absent but the committee met Gen'l Manager Manvel, on Friday afternoon and had a long talk. Mr. Manvel said that the management has never given up the idea of building shops here, and said that the general depression of business all over the country was the reason no move in that direction has as yet been made. He said that he was not prepared to say just when the work could be commenced but thought it would not be before the B. & N. W. is completed. Said that the constant wear and tear on rolling stock, much of which is now getting aged, would, in a short time, demand new shops somewhere in Dakota or Minnesota, and, as the managment feels very friendly toward the citizens of Crookston he thought this city would secure the shops should no action be taken to secure other roads to divide the traffic. The committee sought an interview with Mr. Oakes, of the N. P. line, but was unsuccessful in obtaining one.

QUEEN CITY CHURCHES.

How they Conducted Their Services Sunday.

Hundreds Attend the Various Churches and are Instructed in Eternal Things.

A careful canvass of the city, regarding the work and condition of the city churches, speaks well for the Queen city. Below we give a brief summary of the work done, by some of the most prominent churches:

PRESBYTERIAN.

The pastor, Rev. O. H. Elmer, preached in the morning from Matt. 26-40, having for his theme: "Christ's appeal to His Disciples for sympathy." At 6:30 the young people of the church held a missionary meeting which was conducted by Mrs. Elmer. Below we mention a few of the papers read:

"Mexico," "South America" and "Africa," three papers.

"The Influence of the Missionary Press."

"The Condition of Women in Heathen Lands,"

An impressive feature of the service was the soprano solo, "What Will You Answer Jesus?" which was effectively rendered.

In the evening service the pastor took for his subject the "Life of Saul."

The attendance was good, as it was at the church, where Rev. Chas. Carroll spoke in the morning, from Gen. 13th chapter. The music was good throughout the service; we mention but one selection—Smart's beautiful arrangement of the 23d psalm, which was given by a ladies' trio, with flute accompaniment. The same persons sang "Seek Ye the Lord," arranged by Roberts, in the evening service, which was conducted by the pastors of the Baptist and Congregational churches. It was announced that services would be continued another week, in the Baptist church. The pastor, Rev. Mr. Medlar, preached in the morning from 2d Cor., 3-18, his theme being "The Assimillating Power of the Gospel." In the evening no service was held as the church united with the Baptists, Rev. Medlar preaching the sermon, which had special reference to the "Judgment Day." The church held special services, having in their midst three workers from abroad, Dr. Bridgman, of Hamline University, Rev. Harrison and Mr. McLachlin, of Manitoba. Dr. Bridgman preached in the morning. At 3:30 a gospel meeting was held, and in the evening a packed house listened to the different ministers present, and to Mr. McLachlin's earnest singing. Meetings were announced for the entire week. Rev. Harrison and Mr. McLachlin will remain until next Sunday. At

BAPTIST

CONGREGATIONAL

METHODIST EPISCOPAL

CHRIST CHURCH

Rev. Fortin preached both morning and evening. His subject for the evening discourse was "The Episcopal Church and its Doctrines," Notice is given elsewhere in this issue that there will be no service next Sunday, owing to the rector's absence. Our inquiries concerning the church revealed the following facts: Rev. M. Hillerud, of Devil's Lake, conducted the services, which were of interest, especially in the evening. Here, also, meetings were announced for the week, to be conducted by Rev. O. Wiersen, of St. Paul. Over 300 persons met in the church in the evening to hear the pastor speak from the account of the healing of the Centurian's servant. The services in the afternoon were well attended and were presided over by the pastor, Rev. Carroll, who took his text from the 27th chapter of Mathew.

SCANDINAVIAN METHODIST

We would gladly have given a more detailed account of the sermons at the churches mentioned had the reports given us been more explicit. For lack of information, we have also been forced to omit notice of one or two others.

Ed. George returned on Sunday morning from a pleasant trip to St. Paul, Chicago and Detroit, Mich. While in the latter city he had occasion to cross to Windsor where he met McGarigle, the boodler, Schrieber the forger and a host of high-toned rogues, who, as soon as he had registered as from the United States gathered around him all anxious to know what he was obliged to come over for and how much he got away with. When he informed "de gang" that he came from Crookston, he lost caste at once as they thought he was only an honest man, but he regained some of it when they found out that he was an attorney. He worked up a great ruputation for generosity by inviting all of the boys to go over to Detroit and attend the theatre, which generous offer they promptly declined but were constrained to return the kindness by proffers of Canada Mountain Dew.

Wm. Anglim returned from St. Paul Tuesday morning.

H. Steenerson and C. A. Chiniquy went down the line Tuesday night.

The entertainment to be given by H. W. Mercer, in McKinnon Hall, Feb. 4th and 5th is for the benefit of Col. Cobham Post, G. A. R., and should be well patronized. Don't fail to go, enjoy a good time and help the boys out. Tickets on sale at Herb's.

Last week a young man requested one of our leading jewelers to take him under his instruction, for two or three days, that he might learn the principles of watch construction, thinking that, being of a mechanical turn of mind, he would be able to get a pretty good idea of the business. It is needless to say his request was not honored.

We satisfy all our customers, we ask no bonus, and we pay over money on loans the moment notes are signed.
STEENERSON & McMANUS.

News was received on Monday by Mr. and Mrs. I. U. Jennings, that their son-in-law, I. M. Underhill, who last fall went to Ashville, N. Carolina from Norwalk, Ohio, is very much worse again. It is said that rheumatism has set in and he is unable to help himself in the least. Mrs. Underhill was summoned from their home in Norwalk.

At the encampment in St. Paul last week Hon. A. Barto was elected Department Commander with very little opposition. The great-hearted ex-Lieut-Governor's countenance beamed all over with happiness at this evidence of the love and respects of his old comrades in arms and he said he had rather have their love and respect than the fattest office in the land.

We refer to farmers to whom we have made loans as to our promptness in dealing with them. Ourold customers always recommend their neighbor to us.
STEENERSON & McMANUS.

As Ed. George was meandering the streets of Milwaukee last week enraptured by the music of the dulcet hand-organ, gaping into the show windows and reading all of the signs, who should he come across but F. T. Haseltine, Crookston's original and only nurseryman, looking as hale, hearty and handsome as ever. Frank had lots of inquiries to make concerning us and told Ed. that he should be up in time to warble with the little birds in spring.

We will still continue the system of low prices and trust that the many friends of the Crookston Furniture Co., will continue their liberal patronage with the new proprietors. We shall endeavor to carry only the latest designs of furniture, upholstery, carpets, curtains, mouldings, etc., that can be purchased, and by buying in large quantities we will be able to make prices lower than ever before. New goods are now arriving. We pay all freights to neighboring towns, and will make special inducements to parties living at a distance. Come to Crookston and trade and save 25 per cent. Resp't'y,

Neby Briefs

NEBY, Minn., January 21.

ED. JOURNAL: We have had a regular Dakota blizard in this vicinity. Plenty snow but news is scarce. During the evening of January 16th, while the snowflakes fell thick and fast, a party of men and women was seen facing the blixzaid and breaking through the snow banks on our Broadway Street.

What was the object of this caravan of moonshiners? Their object was to capture H. H. Bangen and family at their residence. The capture was well planned and under the cover of the heavy storm, the party advanced safely and soon occupied the residence. H. H. Bangen was found at headquarters. E. J. Grepthen, on the part of the captors, turned to Bangen and demanded in a commanding tone that he should immediately and unconditionally surrender to the Crank natives of the town Vineland. Mr. Bangen bowed in submission before such high authority as an ex-candidate for sheriff and delivered keys and scepter into the hand of his adversary. After the doors were opened and everything clear on deck, the captor in a few but plain words made the following remarks to H. H. Bangen: "Mr. Bangen, since you have been obedient and shown a good conduct here tonight, no harm shall be done to you or any of your dear ones. Furthermore, since you have always been a true, a noble and good citizen of the town of Vineland, a man who has done much for the rising generation, a man who has done much to promote the general welfare of this community and a man of strong temperance principles that have both in word and action done much for the temperance cause in town of Vineland, Yes, in Polk County, we ladies and gentlemen present, are here to-night to congratulate you 'our dear old Crank,' on your fiftieth birthday, and most sincerely thank you for the good work you have done for the temperance cause, our homes, our children and town. We do not need to pay you in hard cash for the work you have done, it is simply impossible to do it, but to show you that we are now as before, true to our cause and that we remember and honor all true advocates of temperance principles, we hereby bring a token of friendship and remembrance to you, Mr. H. H. Bangen and wife. Mr. Bangen then received his token, which was a fine sofa, and Mrs. Bangen hers, a rocking chair. It was a surprise party to Mr. Bangen and family, but we are sure that they appreciated the unexpected visit.

The masquerade at the rink, Tuesday evening, was a decided succcess reflecting credit upon the management of the rink. The band was out, and the disorder so often attendant upon such events, was not encountered. The costumes were attractive, and in some cases, ludicrous in the extreme. The one-mile race between Scott, Misgan and others, terminated in a decided victory for Scott, thanks to his agility in turning corners. Misgan does strong work on straight running, but will need considerable training before he can successfully compete with "Scotty"

At 2 o'clock last Saturday p. m., H. Watts Sr., well known in this city as an early settler, died at his home on Thief River, of inflamation of the bowels. Deceased was sick for several days, but would not permit his daughter, Miss Lizzie, who was attending him, to summon a physician until about 10 o'clock Saturday a. m., when a messenger was dispatched, but too late, for the doctor did not arrive untill three hours after the sufferer had passed away. The remains were brought to this city yesterday, where those who had been his friends, sadly waited to receive them.

I hope to hear Prof. Moore again on the same subject and hope a general invitation will be given to the public to hear him also.

The Railroad Case.

Judge Stearns has the Duluth & Winnipeg Case Under Advisement.

Duluth Evening Herald.

Arguments in the injunction case of the Brainerd & Northwestern vs. the Duluth & Winnipeg were closed late last night and Judge Stearns took the case under advisement. As stated yesterday attorneys for the plaintiff did not appear, they serving the court with notice to withdraw the temporary injunction without prejudice. This the defendants argued could not be done, as it would allow just what the plaintiff wanted—delay, and it could put an injunction after injunction to restrain the Duluth & Western from receiving the lands until after the close of the present session of the legislature. The Brainerd & Northwestern, it was argued, never was intended as a railroad and never would be one, but was simply a fence set up to delay the Duluth & Winnipeg in its arrangements. It was also argued that should the injunction be withdrawn the bond given by the plaintiff to indemnify the defendant for any loss by the temporary injunction, should it not be allowed by the court, would be void and the defendant would be unable to hold the bondsmen for the injury already resulting. The case was an interesting one and brought out some strong points. Messrs. Warner and Kerr, attorneys for defendant, returned to St. Paul last night.

Married.

Red Lake Falls News.

Tuesday Jan. 22d 1889, at Lousville by the Rev. Eli Theillon, Mr. Joseph Pepin to Miss Rose Huot. The bridesmaid was Miss Delma Huot, while Mr. J. M. Bray, of the West hotel acted as best man. Mr. Pepin has resided in Louisville for many years, coming there with his father, who was one of the first settlers. He is a young man of sterling qualities, remarkable for honesty of character and uprightness. The charming young bride is a daughter of Mr. Louis Huot of the same town. Bright, graceful and attractive as she appeard none can help admiring her many beautiful qualities. Fifty couples were present at the wedding, and the presents are numerous and costly. All enjoyed themselves heartily, and the young couple start out in life with the remembrance of a kind marriage sermon by Rev. E. Theillon. May their journey through life be a pleasant one.

Minnesota Legislature.

Monday, Jan. 14.

SENATE—Less than a quorum being present after prayer by the chaplain the Senate adjourned with great formality, to 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. Scheffer, indeed, attempted to secure a full quorum by moving that the sergeant-at-arms be ordered to summon the absentees to their seats, but Mr. Durant charged him with jocularity, and after a division had been taken on the question of filling the vacant seats the senate adjourned as aforesaid. The number of senators participating in these proceedings was twenty-one.

HOUSE—Not in session.

Tuesday, Jan. 15.

SENATE—Senator Swenson, of Minneapolis, introduced his first bill this session, which makes it unlawful to employ children under 12 years of age in any mercantile, manufacturing or mechanical concern. The bill provides a penalty for each offense of not less than $20, nor more than $50, to be paid into the public school fund. Senator Swenson's bill also provides that no child under 15 years of age shall be employed except during school vacations unless the child shall have attended the school during the year preceding the time of his employment, at least 15 weeks. Proprietors, owners and overseers are required to keep on file a record of the ages of children in their employ, and the number of weeks schooling they have had. The bill provides for inspectors to examine into the condition of employed children and report to the boards of education. It also has a truant clause, which provides that the police or constables may be called on to enforce the law regarding attendance at school of children found idling in public places during school time. The bill was referred to the committee on education.

Other bills introduced were as follows:

By Mr. Gibson—To authorize the city of Austin to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $10,000 to pay indebtedness heretofore incurred by said city. Passed.

By Mr. Scheffer—To pay B. Froiseth $154,-50 in compensation for property furnished the state on a certain voucher in 1862, destroyed by fire at the burning of the old capitol in 1881. Referred to the committee on claims.

By Mr. Chapman—Fixing the time for holding the terms of the district court in Le Sueur county—the fourth Monday in April and third Monday in October each year. Passed.

By Mr. Ward—To amend the special law relative to the municipal court of the city of Waseca. Passed.

By Mr. Edwards—To revise and amend the charter of the village of Preston. Passed.

By Mr. Gibson—Fixing the time for holding the terms of the district court in Mower county—the second Tuesday in April and third Tuesday in September. Passed.

By Mr. Daniels—To amend chapter 225, of the General Laws of 1887, relating to the salary and fees of the secretary of state—a verbal amendment. Referred to the committee on the judiciary.

By Mr. Ives—To amend chapter 65, of the General Statutes of 1878, relative to the service of processes from justice courts. Referred to the committee on the judiciary.

A resolution was adopted for furnishing the senate with seven daily newspapers or their equivalent in weeklies.

The senate went into executive session and rumor has it they confirmed about 1,500 notaries public. It was given out that the senate had agreed to confirm the appointments of D. H. Kiehle as superintendent of public instruction, W. H. H. Taylor as law librarian, and Hudson Wilson as director of the institution for defective.

HOUSE.—On motion of J. C. Flynn, of Morrison, the resolution authorizing the chief clerk to order seven daily papers for the members of the house, was taken from the table. John Ives, of Ramsey, moved to amend, that the number be increased to 10 dailies or their equivalent in weeklies. This brought Jared Benson, the Diogenes of the house, to his feet. He said he had radical objections to the amendment and original resolution, and moved a second amendment that the number be three dailies and ten weeklies. He said that this would give the members a little opportunity to send papers to their constituents who were not able to become regular subscribers. His amendment was lost, while that of Mr. Ives prevailed, the original resolution, as amended, passing by a vote of 82 to 9. Husher, of Hennepin voted no.

The following bills were introduced:

By Jared Benson, of Anoka, for an act to appropriate $20,000 for the University of Minnesota for the support of the agricultural, law and medical colleges; referred to joint committee on State University.

By J. G. Elmquist, of Ramsey, to indemnify B. A. Froyser for money lost on a voucher issued in 1862, and destroyed in the burning of the capitol; referred to committee on claims.

By Eric Sevtson, of Jackson, to amend chapter 80 of the special laws of 1887, by striking out in two places the words "Cottonwood," and "Jackson;" referred by request to Estes of Watonwon and Law of Murray.

By A. C. Forbes, of Lyon, to authorize the county commissioners to issue bonds for the erection of a court house and jail; given its second and third reading and passed under suspension of rules.

By C. W. H. Heidman, of Brown, to authorize county commissioners of Brown county to issue bonds for completion of court house; placed on second and third reading and passed under suspension of rules.

By Henry Downs, of Hennepin, to validate certain bonds, issued under section 29, chapter 10, of the charter of Minneapolis; referred to the Hennepin delegation.

By J. M. Underwood, to amend the city charter of Minneapolis so as to allow the issuance of bonds by the council for public improvements; referred to the Hennepin delegation.

By Mr. Haven, of Sherburne—To fix the salary of inspectors of illuminating oil at $2,000 per year, the fees over and above his salary to go into the state treasury. Referred to committee on public accounts and expenditures.

By H. L. Williams, of Ramsey—To continue and establish a municipal court in Ramsey county, city of St. Paul, enlarging the jurisdiction of the municipal court. Referred to the committee on judiciary.

The bill proposes to give the municipal court jurisdiction over indictment when the penalty does not exceed five years and over civil actions not to exceed $500.

By John Ives, of Ramsey—Relating to the powers and jurisdiction of judges of the district court. Referred to the committee on judiciary.

By F. P. Lane, of Hennepin—An act to repeal an act to prevent debtors from giving preferences to prevent and to secure an equal distribution of property among creditors and for the release of debts against debtors. Referred to committee on judiciary.

By H. F. Stevens, of Ramsey, an act confirming deeds of conveyance of land made by the regents of the state university and legalizing all future conveyances; referred to the committee on university and university lands.

By A. S. Crossfield, of Traverse, to allow the city of Ortonville and the counties of Big Stone and Lac qui Parle to issue $2,000 of bonds to develop the Ortonville granite stone quarry; given its second and third reading and passed under suspension of the rules.

Wednesday Jan. 16

SENATE.—Mr. Biram presented a joint resolution protesting against the repeal of the interstate commerce law, especially the long and short haul clause, and the portions of that law which prohibits pooling. The governor is directed by the terms of the resolution to transmit a copy of it to congress.

An important bill amending the election law was introduced by Mr. Whiteman. The principal changes proposed are the lengthening of the time for holding open the polls (from 6 o'clock a. m. to 6 o'clock p. m. being the time specified in the bill); provision for two additional days of registration; and the repeal of the clause which makes certain provisions of the law applicable only in cities and towns of over five thousand inhabitants. The bill took the usual course, going to the committee on the judiciary.

Senator Clough put in a bill appropriating the sum of $250,000 for the state university.

Petitions for the submission of the question of constitutional prohibition to the people came in from Fillmore, Freeborn, Martin, and Renville counties. The annual report of the prison inspectors on the subject of convict labor was ordered printed.

Senator Halvorson's bill to prevent and punish fraud in the sale of grain and feed, although drafted as a general law, is designed to meet the case of agents who come into the state and sell Bohemian wheat and other fancy varieties of grain to farmers for seed at fancy prices, and then agree to take the crops of the farmers at $3 or $4 a bushel, but never do as they agree. The penalty for such frauds as this is three years imprisonment in the penitentiary, or a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500. The bill is a copy of an Iowa law on the subject.

BILLS PASSED.

By Mr. Gibson—To authorize the towns of Dexter, Brownsdale and Red Rock, in Mower county, to issue bonds to the amount of $25,000 to refund their bonded indebtedness incurred to give assistance to the Southern Minnesota railroad company.

By Mr Crandall—To amend chapter 69, Special Laws of 1878, relating to the trustees of the Pillsbury academy at Owatonna.

By Mr. M. Johnson—To repeal chapter 365, Special Laws of 1887, relating to the clerk of the district court of Kandiyohi county.

HOUSE BILLS PASSED.

To authorize Lyon county to issue bonds to the amount of $50,000 for the erection of a court house.

To legalize the issuing of bonds by the city council of Ortonville.

To legalize the issuing of bonds by the city council of Glencoe. (Two bills.)

HOUSE.—Mr. Hoyt of Goodhue called up his resolution offered last Friday, which provided for a special committee to investigate the condition of the convicts at Stillwater, and spoke very strongly in favor of it. Mr. Benson took a hand in the discussion, and while he agreed with Mr. Hoyt as to the importance of the matter, he thought that the standing committee on prison labor should take care of the matter. Mr. Willrich of Ramsey offered a long substitute resolution, calling for a special joint committee of three senators and five representatives, to be known as a committee on correctional and charitable institutions, who should have charge of all such measures, which should have power to summon before it officers of any state institution, and which should draft any bills that might be necessary. The matter was debated at some length, and finally on motion by Mr. Searle the subject matter of both resolutions was referred to the committee on prison labor when appointed.

A resolution was passed ordering the chief clerk to draw warrants for $10 for each member and officer for postage.

Thursday Jan. 17.

Senate.—Among the bills introduced in the senate yesterday was one presented by Mr. Swenson in amendment of the railway law, declaring that nothing in said law shall be construed to prohibit the railroad companies from giving reduced rate of fare to ministers and students; and also asserting that no provision in the law will apply to street railway companies or to the carriage of freight at reduced rates, for the federal or state governments, charitable institution, expositions, etc. It went to the railroad committee. Mr. Nashbar put in a bill in amendment of chapter 212, Statutes of 1885, and declaring that grist mills shall not take for toll a larger proportion than one-eighth of the grain that is brought to them to be ground. Two important bills were introduced by Goodrich. One relating to the qualifications of jurors in criminal cases provides that the reading of a newspaper account of an occurence shall not disqualify a person from serving as a juror in a case relating thereto if the person can on oath state that he can fairly and impartially render a verdict. The other bill put in by Mr. Goodrich relates to loan and building associations.

The bill put in by Mr. Daniels creating a state examining board went to the committee on education.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

By Mr. Nelson—To reimburse Jared S. Crandall of Burnside, Goodhue county, in the sum of $1,690 for land in Sibley county to which he lost title through an alleged clerical error.

By Mr. Nachbar—An act in amendment of chapter 212, Statutes of 1885, relating to the amount of toll that may be taken by grist mills.

By Mr. Whiteman—To amend chapter 11, General Statutes of 1878, relating to taxes.

By Mr. Swenson—To amend proviso in subdivision A, section 1, chapter 10, General Laws of 1887, relating to the regulation of carriers.

By Mr. Goodrich—To more clearly define the competency of jurors in criminal cases.

By Mr. Daniels—To reimburse Herman Bentley in the sum of $500 for expenses incurred by reason of injury to his eyes received while engaged at work on the hospital for the insane at Rochester.

By Mr. Daniels—To provide for a state examining board.

By Mr. Goodrich—Relating to building and loan associations.

By Mr. M. Johnson—Authorizing the sale of the public building lands in Kandiyohi county by the state auditor, the proceeds to be applied to the capitol building and repair fund.

REPORTED BY COMMITTEES.

By the Military Committee—Bill including the Third regiment as a part of the regular state militia. Referred to the finance committee.

By the Committee on the Judiciary—Bill in amendment of chapter 98, relating to offenses against the public peace. Second reading.

By the Committee on the Judiciary—Bill amending section 16 chapter 65, relating to the service of summons from justice court.

HOUSE BILL PASSED.

To authorize the village of Graceville to issue bonds to fund its floating indebtedness.

HOUSE.—The session was comparatively quiet and ordinary, the only diversion being at the very close. Mr. Kries of Wright had moved to adjourn, when Mr. Williams of Ramsey explained that it was per day and as yet no provision had been made for the payment of the per diem or any other legislative expenses. If the gentleman from Wright would yield, he said, he would like to offer a bill covering the case. It was a slightly embarrassing situation for Mr. Kries, who did not care to appear to anxious after his pay, but he caught the point, and, amid the laughter of the house, remarked, "I yield, of course." Mr. Williams then offered a bill appropriating $120,000, or as much of it as might be necessary, for the expenses. This was quickly passed under suspended rules.

John Ives' bill altering the method of printing legal notices aroused the opposition of the country newspaper men, Dunn and Eastman. In general it proposed to pay for legal notices by the word instead of by the space actually occupied. The country editors secured a champion in Judge Fleming, and after a sharp tilt with H. F. Stevens he had the bill referred to the committee on printing, instead of the judiciary, as Mr. Stevens proposed.

BILLS INTRODUCED AND PASSED.

By Mr. Heidemann of Brown—Appropriating $3,000 for the relief of citizens of Brown county who lost their crops by hail. Referred to the committee on appropriations.

By Mr. Keyes of Winona—Authorizing the supreme court to appoint three men to revise and complete the laws of the state. Referred to the committee on judiciary.

By Mr. C. R. Davis of Nicollet—Two bills to amend the law relating to the incorporation of villages.

By Mr. C. R. Davis of Nicollet—To amend section 27, of chapter 70, of the law relating to jurors. Referred to the committee on judiciary.

By Mr. C. R. Davis of Nicollet—To reimburse Company I. of the Second Regiment, M. N. G., $1,000.75, for personal property destroyed by fire. Referred to the committee on appropriations.

By Mr. Brown of Sibley—To make the paupers of Sibley county a town charge. Passed.

By Mr. Swaim of Le Sueur—To authorize the borough of Le Sueur to issue bonds for a court house. Passed.

By Mr. Davenport of Hennepin—To amend section 87, of chapter 73, of the statutes of 1878. Referred to the committee on judiciary.

By Mr. Hanke of Hennepin—To legalize sheriff's certificates of sales on foreclosures. Referred to committee on judiciary.

By Mr. Lane of Hennepin—To prevent the polution of the waters of Lake Minnetonka. Referred to the Hennepin delegation.

By Mr. Farley of Scott—To authorize the city of Shakopee to issue bonds for improvements. Passed.

By Mr. Farley of Scott—To authorize the city of Shakopee to establish and maintain a sinking fund. Passed.

By Mr. Poe of Goodhue—To appropriate $3,000 to build a bridge across the Cannon river at Cannon Falls. Referred to the committee on roads and bridges.

By Mr. Elmquist of Ramsey—Providing for the election of members of the board of public works. Referred to the Ramsey delegation.

By the Ramsey Delegation—A bill authorizing the register of deeds of Ramsey county to appoint another deputy, and a bill to legalize the acts of Deputy Register C. J. Williams.

By Mr. H. F. Stevens of Ramsey—To authorize the appointment of an inspector of factories. Referred to the committee on labor and labor legislation.

By Mr. Ives of Ramsey—To amend section 31, of chapter 70, of the laws of 1878, relating to the official printing of legal notices. Referred to the committee on printing.

By Mr. Eastman of Anoka—To amend section 19, of chapter 36, of the statutes of 1878, relating to common schools. Referred to the committee on education.

By Mr. Smith, of Hennepin—Authorizing the regents of the university to sell the tract of land on Lake Minnetonka, part of the experimental farm. Referred to the committee on university.

Friday, Jan. 18.

SENATE.—The introduction in the senate by Mr. Ward of Waseca of a resolution calling for an investigation into charges of bribery and corruption in connection with the senatorial caucus Thursday evening was apparently as great a surprise to the gentlemen who voted with Mr. Ward in the caucus as it was to the men who voted for the other candidates.

HOUSE—Quite a number of important bills were introduced and refused, notwithstanding the small attendance. Several senate bills of more or less importance were passed. The first prohibition measure of the session was introduced in the House to-day.

Saturday, Jan. 19.

SENATE.—

BILLS INTRODUCED AND PASSED.

S. F. 66—To authorize the commissioners of Meeker county to issue bonds.

Severe.

A fop's affectations of modesty sometimes meet with an even worse reception than his open vanities. "Aw, you know," said one of this fraternity, "I—aw—weally, I believe I was just going to say something quite stupid!"

"Why don't you say simply that you were going to speak?" asked a bystander.—Youth's Companion.

A party of officers engaged in evicting a tenant from his holding upon the estate of Lord Lurgan, at Lurgan, County Armagh, met with a vigorous resistance, the inmates of the house assailing them with boiling water, stones and pitchforks. A bailiff was stabbed, and Lord Lurgan's agent and a policeman were seriously injured. The riot act was read, when a number of arrests were made. Father Marriman, a priest of Castle Connel, County Limerick, has received three summonses to appear in court to answer charges of inciting tenants to commit outrages.

CONGRESSIONAL.

Weekly Resume of the Proceedings of the Senate and House.

Tuesday Jan. 15.

SENATE.—The senate today devoted most of its session to the discussion of the duty on salt. Mr. Voorhees, from the library committee, reported a joint resolution accepting the donation of the battle sword of Capt. Samuel C. Reed from his son and providing for the presentation to the latter of a gold medal. Mr. Voorhees said he would submit some remarks on the subject in a few days. At 12:20 consideration of the tariff bill was resumed, the pending question being Mr. Vest's amendment putting salt on the free list. When the bill was laid aside, the senate went into secret session, and at 5:55 adjourned.

Mr. Cox, of New York, believed that congress had been derelict in regard to the admission of Dakota and the other territories. He was in favor of the omnibus bill with certain amendments, but he was willing to help any little conference between the two houses of congress which would result in elevating the territories into the rank of statehood. Every territory (except Utah) should be admitted into the union when it had a population sufficient under the law, to elect a member of congress. Some gentlemen talked about the annexation of Canada. It would be time enough to annex Canada when the nebulous territories had put off their rudimentary and donned their stately stoles of manhood. In conclusion Mr. Cox paid a glowing tribute to the great West and was warmly applauded.

HOUSE.—Mr. Springer, of Illinois, spoke in advocacy of the omnibus bill, which he proposed to offer as a substitute. He called attention to various provisions of the constitution of 1885, which he considered bore the marks of having been formulated hastily, and argued that they presented another reason why a new convention should be held. He criticized the clause of the constitution declaring that all the existing archives, records and books belonging to the territory of Dakota should belong to the State of South Dakota. Under that clause the secretary of state of the new state was authorized to go to Bismarck and denude the capitol there of every scrap of paper and every book belonging to the territory.

Mr. Gifford and Mr. Toole both discussed the bill at some length and their remarks were warmly applauded.

Wednesday Jan. 16.

SENATE.—Among the correspondence concerning affairs in Samoa, referred to in President Cleveland's message to congress and which was presented to the senate today, are instructions to Admiral Kimberly from Secretary Whitney, ordering him to proceed at once to Samoa and extend full protection to American citizens and property, and protest against the subjugation and displacement of the native government of Samoa by Germany, as in violation of positive agreement and understanding between powers, and form the German and British governments of our readiness to co-operate in causing all treaty rights to be respected and in resting peace and order on the basis of recognition of Samoan rights of independence endeavor to prevent extreme measures against the Samoans and to bring about peaceful settlement.

The senate resumed consideration of the tariff bill. The proposition of Mr. West to put salt on the free list was rejected without further debate—Yeas, 23; nays, 23. During a discussion between Mr. Morgan and Mr. Hawley, the former said that the young negroes of Alabama were in respect of industry the most God-forsaken people outside of Algiers or Morocco. If the negroes could be expelled from Alabama, the price of lands would go up 100 per cent. In answer to a question of Senator Blair, he said that he favored Senator Wisdom's plan to distribute the negroes throughout the Southern states.

Mr. Blair said that the people of his state would be as glad to welcome the black people of Alabama as to welcome the white ones.

HOUSE.—This was another interesting day in the House on the territorial bill. There were great volumes of oratory, most of it from young orators. It was a field day for the delegates from the territories, who got in their work. Dubois, of Idaho, made his maiden speech.

The House was first addressed by Mr. Joseph, of New Mexico, who presented the claims of that territory for admission into the Union.

Mr. Manson of Missouri, advocated the admission of New Mexico, asserting that the people were fully capable of self-government.

Thursday Jan. 17.

SENATE.—The senate resumed consideration of the tariff bill, the pending question being on the amendment to the tin plate paragraph. Mr. Allison said:

The testimony before the finance committee showed that there was now in this country plant for the production of about 200,000 tons annually of the thin sheets of steel, and iron used for tin plate, and that at least one-half of that plant would be at once utilized for that purpose. But the committee, with a view of making it absolutely certainly that time would be given for the establishment of that industry, proposed that the increase of duty on the plate was not to take effect until Jan. 1, 1890.

A general debate followed in which Senators Vest, Teller, Gorman and Sherman took part.

HOUSE.—To-day was the field day in the house for the territorial bills, and it has been marked by constant and bitter wrangling that the occupant of the chair could not control. It seemed to be settled from the start that Springer was going to have a hard time before him controlling his party in the house despite the caucus. Judge MacDonald opened the ball this morning with a telling speech, which showed he differed decidedly from his Democratic colleagues upon the subject of admission. He explained the substitute which he had prepared for Springer's amended bill and showed that Dakota was entitled to immediate admission and to division without a vote upon that question. Mr. Adams of Illinois characterized the omnibus bill as a transparent subterfuge.

Friday Jan. 18.

SENATE.—The senate to-day continued discussion of the tariff bill, the pending question being the sugar bounty amendment. Mr. Reagen spoke in opposition to the amendment, expressing surprise that the bounty was not to be extended to maple sugar. He quoted against the proposed bounty Judge Cooley's work on constitutional limitations. Mr. Spooner reminded him of a decision in the Michigan courts that bounty on salt was constitutional.

Mr. Spooner said:

He did not approve of every item in the bill, but he was in favor of reducing the revenue on the lines of the bill. He had no doubt of the constitutionality of the sugar bounty clause. The language of Senator Reagan would come with ill grace from any senator, but came with particularly ill grace from a senator who, having once taken an oath to support and defend the constitution, joined afterwards with those who sought to destroy and overturn it.

HOUSE.—The committee on agriculture reported adversely on the senate bill to encourage the cultivation and manufacture of hemp and flax.

Springer's omnibus substitute passed the House by a vote of 144 to 90. If such a thing could be, the House was more noisy than on yesterday. From the time the House convened until adjournment, there was the wildest possible excitement. Party spirit ran high, and political blood was at fever heat.

A vote was taken immediately after the opening of the session upon MacDonald's substitute, which embodies the main features of the omnibus bill, but provides for the immediate admission of South Dakota. It was rejected—yeas, 117; nays, 122.

Saturday, Jan. 19.

SENATE.—When the senate resumed consideration of the tariff bill to-day the sugar schedule was taken up, but no amendment being offered the senate passed to the paragraph relating to penknives and razors, the question being on the amendment reported from the finance committee. After considerable discussion the amendment was agreed to without division. It provides that pocket knives worth not more than 50 cents per dozen shall pay a duty of 12 cents per dozen; between 50 cents and $2.60 cents per dozen, 50 per cent ad valorem on all; that razors and razor blades worth $4 or less per dozen shall pay $1 per dozen; other $1.25 per dozen, and 30 per cent ad valorem additional on all.

Several amendments were offered by the Allison in regard to guns and glass bottles.

HOUSE.—The Ford immigration committee to-day reported to the house as a result of the investigation of the committee last summer, a bill prohibiting the admittance into the United States of idiots, paupers, those who have been convicted of infamous crime or misdemeanor involving moral turptitude, persons affected with loathsome or contagious diseases, or those coming under contract to work in this country; except university professors or ministers of the gospel. The penalty for the person violating this provision or assisting another to violate is a fine of $1,000 on conviction within two years.

Monday Jan. 21.

SENATE.—In the senate to-day Senator Davis presented a petition from Hon. Pat Cudmore and 274 other citizens of Faribault, Minn., praying for negotiations looking to the purchase of Cuba; also a resolution of the chamber of commerce, St. Paul, praying for the passage of an act to prevent dumpage into the Mississippi river so as to obstruct navigation. The resolution also asks for increased appropriation for the upper Mississippi river to the end that the engineer corps may not be crippled in its labors and thwarted for lack of adequate means to carry on its work. Senator Davis also presented petitions from 346 citizens of Minnesota asking for the passage of a national Sunday rest law. Similar petitions were presented from citizens of Rushford, Minn., and from Westminister Presbyterian church of Minneapolis; also from the Evangelical preachers' meeting of Minneapolis. He also presented resolutions adopted by the Turnverein Germania of St. Paul protesting against the bill providing for a Sunday rest law. In the house similar petitions from Minnesota were presented by Messrs. Nelson and Rice.

HOUSE.—As the consideration of the tariff bill in the senate draws to a close speculation is rife as to how the measure will be treated when it reaches the house. So far there is nothing like a formal conference on either side upon the subject, although the members of the ways and means committee individually have been thoughtfuly considering the matter. Chairman Mills remarked in a sarcastic tone, that if the house did not refer the senate bill to the committee on appropriations, or to the committee on war claims, or to some committee other than that on ways and means, and decided to place the responsibility for its treatment upon himself, he would get his committee together and determine what was best to be done.

How to Cook an Old Fowl.

Like John Gilpin's wife, being always "on frugal thoughts intent," I must give your readers a very nice way of using cold chicken, or an old hen that is so tough as to be inedible cooked in any ordinary way, says a lady in Rural New Yorker. Supposing the latter to be your stumbling-block, dress as for roasting, omitting the dressing. Put it on in plenty of boiling water, and cook slowly until very tender. Salt the water, and add such flavorings as stalks of celery and parsley, and you will have the foundation for one or more delightful soups. Set away the stock until cold, take off the fat and reserve it for frying. A four-pound chicken should make at least three pounds of stock. Put a portion of this over the fire for soop with two tablespoonfuls of rice, two of minced celery, and one of parsley, and cook until the rice is tender. For the next day a cream of chicken will be nice. Heat a quart of stock to boiling, and in another vessel half a pint of cream or milk. In still another saucepan, melt a tablespoonful of butter, make a roux (browned butter and flour) with an equal quantity of flour; add the boiling soup slowly, and then the cream, and serve with crackers. Celery, salt, and white pepper are the seasonings.

The fowl itself will serve for cutlets and patties of chicken. Chop two cupfuls of chicken rather fine. In a double boiler heat a cup of cream. Pour this over a teaspoonful of butter melted, and rubbed smooth with two of flour; stir until it forms a thick paste; add the minced chicken, half a teacupful of minced, uncooked mushrooms, and season to taste with grated nutmeg, cayenne, minced parsley, and grated onion. Mix well, and turn out into a flat buttered dish to cool. Form into cutlets, egg, bread-crumb, and fry in hot fat. Serve with mushroom or cream sauce.

For the patties chop very fine about the same quantity of cold chicken as above; rub this with three tablespoonfuls of cream until smooth. If you have not cream, make this quantity of white sauce. Season with salt, cayenne, and celery salt. Line some patty pans with puff paste. Now add to the minced meat the whites of three eggs, one at a time Fill the molds two-thirds full of this mixture, cover with stiff paper, and bake twenty minutes in a quick oven. Serve with a cream sauce.

The "Sentence System."

Charles Dickens, while visiting the Massachusetts school-ship, was called upon for a "speech." He responded by saying, "Boys, do all the good you can, and make no fuss about it."

Mr. Dickens, as his novels attest, believed in the beneficial effect of a pithy saying and a striking proverb—pointed words which would fasten themselves in the memory. The conductors of the "Netherlands Mettray," one of the model reform schools of Holland, use this "sentence system" as a means of moral education. They hang on the walls such sentences as these:

"He who seeks himself will not find God." "A poor man he who has nothing but money;" He is a fool who lives poor to die rich;" "Labor has a golden bottom;" "Care for the moments, and these will care for the years."

Sometimes a boy is made to learn a sentence by heart. One boy was overheard using foul speech to a comrade. He was ordered to read to the boys every morning for eight days this sentence, "It is better to be dumb than to use the tongue for filthy talk." It made him clean in speech.—Youth's Companion.

Forbidden.

Wit is always sure of a high market value, whether it runs in legitimate or in unexpected channels.

When Dr. Keats was head-master at Eton, the boys of a certain class were told to write a theme on the Latin maxim, Temere nil facias. When the time came for handing in the papers, one boy named Rasleigh appeared without his.

"Where is your theme, sir?" asked the doctor.

"I haven't done it sir."

"Not done your theme, sir?"

"No, sir," persisted the youth, apparently quite undismayed at the prospect of apple-twigs. "Why, sir, you told me not to do it!"

"I told you?"

"Yes, sir; you said, 'Temere nil facias,'—'do nothing, Rashleigh' (rashly)."

The head-master was so delighted with the pun, that he smiled on the joker, and said no more.—Youth's Companion.

Thirty-one Days Adrift.

When one read of a shipwrecked crew being picked up after six, ten, or sixteen days, of drifting about on the Atlantic in a yawl you are surprised, says a writer in the New York Sun, that they were not sooner sighted. Novelists would have us believe that the ocean is dotted with sails, and that every square mile of it is plowed over at least once a day by craft of some sort. Let one look at the shipping in the harbors of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia and he will almost wonder how they can avoid each other outside. It is hard for one to realize the immensity of the Atlantic until they voyage across it. I made a voyage from Cape Town to Australia, clear across the Indian ocean, without one single sail being sighted. I made one from San Francisco to New Zealand and sighted only two. I made one from the Sandwich islands to Lima without passing any craft close enough to see her pull. I was once wrecked on Santiago, and during the seven days we were on a raft twelve ships came within sight, and three or four of them almost within hearing of our voices and yet none noticed us. No craft except a whaler keeps a lookout aloft. A ship may, therefore run within a mile of a raft, or within two miles of a dismantled hulk, and see nothing unless by accident. If the way ahead is clear the average steamer, ship, or brig has no eyes for any other point of the compass.

In the year 1560 I left the island of Trinidad on the English brig Duchess, bound for Parnahyba, coast of Brazil. An English syndicate had been boring for coal oil near that port, and with such indications of success that we were taking up a large cargo of tight barrels to hold the stuff. These barrels had come to Trinidad as salvage from a wreck, and had been brought in by the syndicate. Each barrel had a hard wood bung, and each bung was driven in place as the barrels came aboard. I state this because these simple details had a great bearing on the length of our voyage. Having several thousand barrels aboard, any one of which would have floated two men in the water, there was no danger of the brig going to the bottom, no matter if she started half a dozen planks. It was, doubtless, for this reason that the captain, whose name was Kimball, left port short two men. Indeed, we had a crew which would have passed for shabby on any sort of a craft. There were only three of us who dared rate as able seamen, and the captain was almost too drunk to walk when we left port.

I wanted to get down the coast to join a Scotch whaler, or I should never have become one of the crew of the Duchess. She had an unseaworthy look from masthead to waterline, and things aboard were very slovenly. However, we got away after a deal of fuss and feathers, and, hauling well out from the coast, set our course. We had just four hours of fair weather, and this gave us time to get the decks cleared of the raffle. Then the wind suddenly veered about and struck us head on, and we were obliged to box the yards about. While we seemed to be going ahead all the time, we no doubt made drift enough to offset it, as the brig was a little better than a square box at most, and if she had any best sailing point no one ever discovered it. Every time she made a tack it took all hands to swing the yards, and after one night of it there was a good deal of growling. The captain shut himself up for a quiet drunk, and the poorest man before the mast soon seized the chief mate up correctly. His name was Hastings, and while he made a great show of commanding the brig, it was easy to see that he was very much worried over the responsibility. The second mate, whose name was Waters, made no bones about confessing his unfitness, having never been anything higher than a mate of a coal schooner on the English coast.

On the evening of the second day we had trouble. A big negro who had shipped before the mast refused to do duty. Some mates would have knocked him down off-hand and half killed him, but Hastings was afraid of him, and went down to consult the captain. That official was in a drunken stupor, and could not be aroused. The mate returned to the deck and made threats, and the result was a murder before our eyes, and before one of us could lift a hand to prevent it. The negro was the only mutineer, and the rest of us were for the mate. Had he ordered to seize and bind the negro not a man would have hesitated. While he was threatening what he would do, instead of taking the bolder course and doing something, the negro rushed in on him and inflicted a stab which proved fatal within half an hour. After thus using his knife, he took up his quarters in the fo'castle and swore that he would kill any man who dared descend after him. We pulled the cover over and made him prisoner, but in a short time realized that we were in the fix of the man who dare not let go of the bear. None of us had a change of clothes or could turn in.

In this emergency Mr. Waters took the responsibility of hauling the captain out of his berth and trying to make him understand the situation. The beast got back enough sense to realize that his sacred person was being pulled and hauled about, and he got hold of a pistol and threatened to shoot the next man who disturbed him. In this emergency we held a fo'castle council. Some were for putting back, others for running into Georgetown, and others for holding on until next day, and seeing how the captain would come out. It was when we were engaged in this discussion, and no one had an eye on the weather, that an "ox-eye" struck the brig and brought both masts down together as if they had been chopped off. The instincts of a sailor set every man at work without orders, but the old hulk got pretty badly banged about before we had the wreckage cut clear and the danger averted. The negro murderer came on deck during the confusion, but, instead of aiding us to save the brig, he got the yawl into the water, put in water and provisions, and when we were finally at liberty to look about us he was ready to shove off. He was too quick for us, and away he drifted into the darkness to leeward, the yawl bouncing like a cork, and seemingly about to upset, but the fellow was as cool as ice, and getting her off before the seas. As the mainmast came down a block or strap fell upon the head of a sailor named Cherter. We could not give him any attention for half an hour, and when we got around to it he was dead. We were dismasted, had two corpses aboard, our only boat was gone, and the captain was still drunk Sailor Jack had some curious adventures, and is surrounded by strange circumstances, but none could well have been in a worse fix than we were aboard of the Duchess.

The question of what we could or should do had been narrowed down very materially. The hull was not much damaged and we knew that it could never sink with those barrels aboard. We hauled the corpses out of the way, covered them with a spare sail, and then every man was at liberty to do as he pleased. All discipline was gone, and as the hull sat high out of water no one felt any immediate danger. The wind and sea both fell after the blast that dismantled us, and before 10 o'clock I believe that every Jack aboard was sound asleep. I remember that it was after sunrise when I went on deck, and I was the first one up. In about three minutes the captain made his appearance. He was not yet over his spree and had doubtless come on deck to have a row. One look around him was sufficient to change his mind on that point. He was completely knocked out at what he saw, and his countenance betrayed all the emotions in the calendar as he approached me and asked:

"W—What is is, Reefer?"

"We were struck by a squall last evening and dismasted, sir."

"And I—I—"

"We tried to call you up, sir, but you was dead drunk."

It was my opportunity to give it to him straight, and I did not spare him.

"Yes, sir," I went on, as he passed his hand over his eyes, as if to clear away a veil, "it was your fault. You were drunk when we left port, and you got stupid soon after that. You are responsible for what this covers, sir, as well as the loss of this brig."

I took his arm and walked him over to the bodies and pulled off the sail. It was a shocking sight, and no wonder he started back with a cry of horror.

"How—was—it?" he slowly demanded.

"The colored man stabbed the mate, sir, and the man was killed as the masts went over. Both deaths are laid at your door. This is the result of your lying drunk."

"Great God! Great God!" he gasped as he held up his hands in horror.

"Yes, sir; it's an awful night's work," I said in reply. "And what are we to do now?"

"Dead! Both Dead! And the brig a wreck!" he whispered, as he glared around him.

At that moment the men began to appear on deck, and the captain covered his face with his hands for a moment, and then rushed into his cabin. We gathered around the stump of the foremasts as all came on deck, but not over ten minutes had elapsed when the steward came out, shouting that the captain had gone. We rushed aft in a body, and there he was on his back in the water, hands over his eyes, and the water just covering them. He was probably dead then, but if not we were helpless. We had no boat, and before any one brought a rope the body had drifted too far away to be caught. The man had crawled through one of the cabin windows, and I doubt if he had yet fully recovered his senses.

As soon as we had had a bite to eat Mr. Waters insisted that I take command of the wreck. I knew myself to be the best sailor aboard, and when all the other men joined in I agreed to take the responsibility of acting as commander. We had now a steward, who was also cook, three men, and a boy, making five souls aboard. The masts were old and rotten, and had gone off close to the deck, playing smash with the port bulwarks as they crashed down. We first tried the pumps. The brig was leaking, but not to alarm. I believe that we could have rigged up jury masts and got some sort of sail on the craft, but the stinginess of the owners took that hope away. There were no spare spars or sails, or at least nothing to suit our purpose. We went at it and repaired the bulwark as well as possible, and then rigged a signal spar to the stump of the foremast, which offered the best hold. When we had run up a signal of distress there was nothing more for us to do but wait until help should arrive. We were, as every one must know, off the Brazilian banks much frequented by whalers. There was a good bit of coasting trade as well, and we wondered greatly that some craft or other had not already fallen in with us. When we had rigged our signal our strange voyage may be said to have begun.

It was agreed that all should live on the cabin stores as long as they lasted, and two of the men occupied the state-rooms of the mates without objection. While we were a free and easy community in one way, I can say for the men that sailors never behaved better. By common consent we flung overboard all intoxicating liquors, and no man sought to take advantage of my doubtful authority to issue orders. By night we hung a lantern instead of the flag, and we took turn and turn at keeping the deck.

There was nothing whatever else to do, as the weather continued fair, and the men slept all the night and a good share of the day. I will now give some extracts from the diary I kept and have ever since preserved.

"Sixth day—Not a sail has been sighted since our accident. All well. From the set of the wind and currents I am certain we have drifted a long way to the east—out into mid-ocean. We start the pumps twice a day.

"Eleventh day.—We have been drifting to the northeast for the last three days. No sign of a sail yet. Pebbles, able seamen, is quite ill.

"Fourteenth day—Pebbles died yesterday. It was a great shock to us, and no one thought him seriously ill. He went off very quietly, and his death makes all uneasy. We are now drifting to the west, toward the coast.

"Eighteenth day.—Ransom, able seaman, died last night. He had been helping himself to the contents of the medicine chest and it is believed he poisoned himself. We are only three now, and Waters is broken down. We are drifting down the coast as I make out.

"Twenty-first day.—Waters and the steward were both missing this morning. I have hunted the brig from end to end, and as they cannot be found I believe they ended by going overboard during the night. The boy weeps all the time and refuses to hope for rescue. I thought I saw a sail early this morning but was not sure. It is only by the greatest effort I can keep my spirits. We are drifting seaward.

"Twenty-seventh day.—I have been all alone for three days, the boy having gone overboard. There are times when I want to follow him. I made out a distant sail yesterday. But for that I should have ended it last night. I would give my right arm to hear the sound of a human voice. We are drifting to the east very fast.

Thirty-first day.—Rescued this morning by the whaler Lucy and Jane of the United States, after a drift of a full month, during which time, as computed by the captain of the whaler, the hulk has drifted 1,500 miles. Only one sail sighted in the whole time."

The Sad Fate of a Boston Youth.

"Calliope," said the youth, in soft, thrilling, tender tones, as he gazed fondly in the fate of the beautiful girl who sat beside him on the crimson crush-plush tidy decorated sofa, "Calliope," and he pressed the snowy, velvty and shapely hand which he had taken in his, and which not withdrawn, "the time has come for a perfect understanding between us. I can no longer live in uncertainty. I must know my fate, Drifting about in the 'dismal swamp' of doubt and suspense is making my life a torture. I must declare myself. Calliope.. I love you deeply, passionately, devotedly, tenderly, and it is for you to say whether that love is to be my happiness or my misery. Tell me, Calliope, sweetest, dearest, fairest, tell me, can you return my affection?"

"Oh, Algernon," murmured the beautiful maiden, a deep blush overspreading her countenance, as the shadow of a cloudlet passes over the silvery surface of a stream on a sunny June day, "this is so sudden!"

"Oh, answer me," he implored, "do spare my feelings. Death is preferable to suspense."

She turned away her face to conceal her confusion, as she replied, in tones as soft, sweet and musical as ever trembled on the strings of the lyre of Orpheus:

"It is useless for me to deny that you have made a deep impression on my heart, and—and—but let that admission content you. Maidenly modesty forbids me to say more."

"Oh, my darling," he exclaimed, as he passionately kissed her hand, "you have made me the happiest of men. But there is one thing about which I wish to be satisfied—have I a rival in your affections?"

"You have not."

"There is nothing between Percy Yardstick and you?"

"Absolutely nothing."

"But he loves you, and swears he will win you."

"Be not afraid," she said, "he is—"

"Poor?"

"Worse than that."

"He is what!" and in breathless excitement he awaited her answer.

"He is—" and placing her rosy lips close to his ear, while her color came and went, revealing in her face alternately the lily and the rose, she murmured in a voice as soft as the sigh of a zephyr—"He is in the soup."

Improvement of the Hair.

Hair must be carefully cultivated to grow even in length, supple, silken and graceful in color. Everything is encouraging for the improvement of hair if time can be given it. The same treatment will not do for different kinds of hair by any means. Strong, stiff, naturally moist hair needs a weekly shampooing and daily and nightly brushing, with exposure to the morning and evening sun, which is a great stimulent to the hair. Thin, soft, dry hair needs tender care but with either the first step toward improvement is thorough washing of the scalp and hair, which collects dust its entire length. To cleanse it the various alkalies, borox, ammonia carbonate of potash and washing soda are used, and the strong hair will bear them, but they burn the life out of thin, dry hair.

The Venetian ladies drew their hair through a crownless hat and let it stream over the brim to dry, and you may follow the example, sitting in the sun if possible an hour. Light is a great stimulent and preservative to hair, and it is well to open it when dry and let the wind blow through. The sun will cause the natural oil of the hair to flow—or the head may be held to the fire till the dry hair feels moist. A smart brushing night and morning, careful braiding before sleep, and an hour spent once a month clipping all the forked ends, will insure a rapid, growth of hair, if the general health is good, without other treatment. If you want a stimulent at night rub a little oil of lavender in the roots of the hair with a shampoo brush. Do not irritate the scalp by hard brushing. Regular care is better than overdoing.—Shirley Dare.

New York Truth.

There was an incipient riot at the Lorena apartment house a few days since, and it all became about because Ralph Harrison, of the Hotel Register brought two balded-headed parrots into the building. These active and irreligious birds were born and brought up amid surroundings that must have been honest, for they were miserably poor and the ordinary school education, which was the only advantage possessed by the couple, was taken where the extent of learning was measured by the wormwood and gall of the conversational powers. Mr. Harrison moved in on Tuesday, and on Wednesday the parrots had become thoroughly acclimated and lubricated their language ready for any emergency that might require its employment. The opportunity was not long in coming. Two cooks employed on the second and fifth floors respectively indulged in the customary exchange of confidences from their windows on the air shaft, and remarked in an incidental manner of the delicacies each expected to enjoy for dinner. Suddenly, at the most intensely exciting period of the confidence, a voice rang out with all the conciseness and clearness of a philospher chary of his breath:

"Oh, shut up!"

"Shut up, who?" came excitedly from the second story.

"Oh, shut up!" was repeated.

"Shut up yourself, you freckled huzzy; what right have you to interrupt us?" came from the fifth.

"Yes, you impudent thing, it would be more becoming for you to mind your own business," echoed the second.

"Show your frowzy head out of your window, wherever you are, and I'll fill it with redhot ashes," was the upper floor's threat.

"Rats!" came the voice again.

"Hold your tongue," I tell ye, you miserable insultin' nuisance, "or I'll complain to Mr. Burte about ye." Mr. Burte is the cyclone that preserves order among discordant tenants.

"I know who ye are, confound ye, and I'll get even with ye. I'll make life a burden to ye," was uttered in a falsetto shriek from second.

"Shut up, shut up, SHUT UP!" came in a volley, and whether it was the vehemence of the continued assault or that the infuriated chefs caught sight of the green feathers and yellow head of their tormentor as Mrs. Harrison removed him from the neighborhood of the window and placed him further indoors, is not known, but of a sudden the air shaft became as silent as the husband of a prima donna, until the laughter of that wise bird, smothered by distance, came to the grateful consciousmess of the amused listeners thereabouts.

A Captive for Thirteen Years.

Miss Jessie Lacomber, who is making a short visit to this city, says The San Francisco Call, has a romantic history. She is the stepdaughter of Gen. Lagreato, a retired Mexican officer, who became a citizen of the United States many years ago.

Miss Josie was stolen from her parents in 1871 by the Banitto tribe of Indians of northern Idaho. For thirteen years her parents were unaware of her whereabouts, and many times had given her up for dead. The matter was brought to the attention of the United States government and a search begun. Gen. Sheridan was the man selected to look up the case, and after a protracted investigation, in which the department at Washington expended many thousand dollars, and during which many lives were lost, she was rescued Aug. 7, 1884. The guide whom Gen. Sheridan employed during his search was the famous Dosh Kensington, a great Indian scout and frontiersman.

Miss Lacomber is a woman perhaps 26 years of age, and although giving no evidence of careful education, is quite intelligent, and is not in any wise reticent about relating the history of her captivity.

When she arrived at the age of 13 one of the chiefs of the Banittos declaring that he would make her his wife. She indignantly refused, declaring that she wished to go back to her parents.

In order to force her to marry the copper colored captain the Indians resorted to easy methods of torture, but, finding it impossible, gradually increased the dose. As evidence of the ordeal which she suffered Miss Lacomber now exhibits sixteen wounds, the result of knife gashes, on her person. Finding they could not prevail upon her to comply, the barbarians forsook their brutal methods, and for the remainder of her stay contented themselves with keeping a strict watch upon her movements.

After being rescued Miss Lacomber went to her home only to find that her father had been killed by the Mexicans along the Rio Grande for participating in clearing some renegades from Texas.

Slower Than Christmas.

Yes, my son, yes, Philadelphia is a slow old town—a slow, pokey, checker board Quaker town. It is as you say, an overgrown country village. One of the villagers has just given $1,500,000 for the establishment of a free school of mechanical trades, wherein the instruction, boarding and lodging are free. The villager has done this all very quietly, while New York is loudly declaring what a monument she would build to the memory of Grant if somebody else would furnish the money. Oh, yes! Philadelphia is a slow town. There is no life in it. Once in a while a villager like Isaiah Williamson gets off a joke of the industrial school pattern that makes the angels laugh. But your jokes about Philadelphia, my son, makes other people laugh. Yes, indeed. Got one ready now? Well, fire it off, and we'll listen to the crackling of the thorns. How cheerful they sound. Pity they don't last longer.—Burdette in Brooklyn Eagle.

Blown From a Gun.

From Kayes' History of the Sepoy War.

During the Sepoy rebellion of 1857-58 many of the mutineers were blown away from the guns. It was a terrible punishment, one which had been inflicted a century before at the first mutiny of the Bengal army in 1764. A battalion of Sepoys had seized and imprisoned its English officers and vowed that it would serve no more. A strong hand arrested the mutiny at its beginning. Twenty-four Sepoys were tried by a drum-head court martial, found guilty sentenced to be blown away from the cannon.

On the day of the execution the troops were drawn up, English and Sepoys, the guns were loaded, and the prisoners led forth to suffer the terrible penalty.

The word of command was given for the first four criminals to be tied up to the muzzles of the guns. As the men were being bound four tall, stately grenadiers stepped forward from among the condemned Sepoys, saluted the commander, Maj. Hector Munro, chief of the Bengal army, and asked that as they had always had the post of honor in life, they might be given the precedence in death, as it was their due. The request was granted. The grenadiers were tied to the guns and blown to pieces.

A murmur ran through the Sepoy battalions, who greatly outnumbered the English troops, and it seemed as if they were about to rescue their companions, the twenty condemned men.

The officers of the native regiments approached Munro and told him their men were not to be trusted, as they had determined not to permit the execution to proceed. The chief knew that on the issue of that parade for execution depended the fate of the Bengal army. The English troops were few and there was scarcely a man among them not moved to tears by the fearful death of the four grenadiers. But the commander knew that they could be trusted to defend the guns, which, turned upon the Sepoys, would defeat any attempt to rescue their comrades.

Maj. Munro closed the English on the battery—the grenadiers on one side, the mariners on the other—and loaded the pieces with grape. Then he sent the Sepoy officers back to their battalion and gave the native regiments the word of cammand, "Ground arms!"

"They knew it would be madness to disobey in presence of the loaded guns and laid down their arms!"

"Right about face! Forward—march!" was the next command.

The Sepoys marched a distance from their grounded arms, and the English soldiers, with their guns, took ground on the intervening space.

The danger had passed away. The native troops were at Munro's mercy, and the execution went on to its dreadful close. The sacrifice of a few lives saved thousands.

The Mother-in-Law.

Perhaps to-day there is no relation in life in which a woman is so persistently abused and misunderstood as in that to her daughter's husband says the New York Press. It has been made the theme of the jest book the circus clown, and the topical songster ad nauseam. In the vulgar and witless warning against matrimony, sung by Nadjy, it is encouraging to note that the hit at "mother-in-law" extracts only a sickly smile from the audience. No doubt this is due to the staleness of the subject quite as much as its false sentiment but let us hope it marks a revulsion in public taste, notwithstanding that fair bride, Amelle Rives, who makes Herod say:

> Methinks that Satan was a married man > and his wife's mother egged him to rebel, seeing Heaven would not hold them both.

People are beginning to find out that when a man vilifies his mother-in-law it is generally safe to assume that he ill-treats his wife. A young girl, when she marries, takes it for granted that her husband's love and devotion will continue to be hers as much as the sunshine and air. The mother, from her wider observation and perhaps bitter experience, is full of fears and alarm. When her daughter stood at the altar she trembled. She was losing not only her child, but her power of insuring that child's happiness. Her maternal eye, keen as eagle's, seeks to pierce the future; but no, she must fold her brooding wings and wait with beating heart to learn if this marriage meant the highest happiness or the greatest misery that comes to woman.

In the former case the mother joyously feels she has not been robbed of a daughter, but been given a son. Her heart turns in gratitude and love to the man in whose hands her daughter's lot is secure; indeed, it is doubtful if she feels more tenderness for her own son. As to the young husbands, he regards with reverence and filial affection the mother of the woman he adores, and who has made her what she is.

On the other hand what intolerable anguish comes to that mother who, condemned to see the child she has so tenderly reared, so carefully sheltered from every rough wind and word, now the victim, or the servant, of a man whose "love" expired with possession, or whose cruelty or neglect is sapping the life of the young wife. If the mother interposes to reason, remonstrate, or save her daughter, the floodgates of abuse are opened, and in that portion of society in which the master of ceremonies is the police justice he accepts the excuse of "mother-in-law," when he should ask: "Why was she driven to interfere?"

Of course there are weak, foolish and even tyrannical women who would like to rule their sons-in-law as they do their husbands, with hysterics or rods of iron, but these are the exceptions, not the rule, which should permit a large class of women, mothers in the first place, to become a target for cheap wit and an excuse for martial brutality.

Reflections on a Suicide.

From the Press.

There were two rooms and door between them was closed. In one room stood before her mirror a pretty girl of 20, smiling and blushing as she fastened the orange blossoms in her hair. In the other room stood before her mirror a woman of 30. On her face was stamped desperate resolve, in her hand was an open razor.

Down stairs the wedding breakfast was spread, and strains of Mendelssohn mingled with the voices and laughter of the guests and groomsmen, who were awaiting the advent of the bride and her sister.

Presently there was the sound of a heavy fall, a door flung open, a piercing shriek. Hasty feet ran up stairs. Yes, there was the bride, in her wedding garments, holding in her arms her sister, whose white throat was marked with a terrible necklace of red.

What had brought about this dire catastrophe? The answer was in the dead woman's own writing: "I have not the courage to be an old maid." Tragedy and comedy struggling together!

In Cincinnati the unhappy one who had destroyed herself was well known and respected. The eldest daughter, she had been also the clever housewife, the nurse of her aged parents, the teacher and almost mother of her "little sister." Every day with a man's courage and a womans patience she had taken up the petty burdens and cares of life that it might be made easier to those she loved. In return she recieved the usual amount of gratitude and affection, mingled, as time went on, with numerous jokes and gibes thought appropriate to the "old maid" of the family.

For Round Shoulders.

I have seen a stooping figure and a halting gait, accompanied by the unavoidable weakness of lungs incidental to a narrow chest, entirely cured by the simple and easily performed exercise of raising one's self upon the toes leisurely in a perfect perpendicular several times daily. To take this exercise properly one must take a perfect perpendicular several times daily. To take this exercise properly one must take a perfect position with the heels together and the toes at an angle of 45 degrees. Then drop the arms lifelessly by the sides, animating and raising the chest to its full capacity muscularly; the chin well drawn in, and the crown of the head feeling, as our professor used to put it, as if attached to a string suspended from the ceiling above. Slowly raise the balls of both feet to the greatest possible height, thereby exercising all of the muscles of the legs and body; come again into the standing position, without swaying the body backward out of the perfect line. Repeat this exercise, first on one foot and then on the other. It is wonderful what a straightening-out power this exercise has upon round shoulders and crooked backs, and one will be surprised to note how soon the lungs begin to show the effect of such expansive development.

The St. Paul Carnival Association Explains Postponement of the Winter Carnival of 1889.

IN announcing the postponement of the annual ice palace and winter carnival of St. Paul for the season of 1889—Jan. 23 to Feb. 1—to the season of 1890, the Carnival Association does so with the feeling that its efforts have been rendered futile through the prevalence of that renowned article known as Minnesota weather.

While other sections of the country, less fortunate than this, have experienced the rigors of cold and snow, St. Paul and Minnesota felt during the month of December, 1888, a temperature 58 deg. above zero. Skies as soft in hue as the empyrean blue of June; winds shorn of the fierceness of Borealis; a sun so genial that the heavy clothing of the winter months was burdensome. Streets in the city and country were and are free from snow and ice, and the streams, half-frosted, scarcely bear the burden of the skaters.

On Christmas day the temperature at St. Paul was 23 deg. above zero, and New Year's, 33 deg. above. The precipitation of snow and rain during December was infinitesimally small. There were twenty-two days of sunshine in that month, and only one stormy day. To date (Jan. 9th) there have been seven days of sunshine in January and but two of clouds.

Under such climatic conditions it is manifestly impossible for an ice palace to be erected at the date set by this association.

Nevertheless, the association, while regretting the temporary abandonment of their plans, cannot fail to call this attention to the claim so often made by them during past seasons, that the climate of St. Paul and Minnesota during the winter months has again surpassed the world in healthfulness and those other qualities that go to make localities charming resorts at any time of the year.

Come and visit us in 1890. Should there be ice by that time sufficient to erect a palace, St. Paul, as the first ice palace and carnival city of the United States, will welcome you, and present attractions superior to any yet offered.

WASHBURN IS WINNER

He is Nominated by the Republican Legislators for United States Senator on the Third Ballot.

The Caucus was called to order by Senator Edwards, who called for nominations for chairman, and Mr. Flynn named the man agreed upon, Senator M. J. Daniels of Olmstead county. Senator Daniels took the place usually occupied by Speaker Graves, and thanked the convention in a neat speech;

He was gratified, he said, that this caucus had been called in the interests of peace and harmony, and that the movement for the caucus had met with the sanction of those eminent and distinguished gentlemen who were to be placed in nomination for the United States senatorship. He then spoke of his Republicanism—a Republicanism that dated back to the days of Lincoln and that had been schooled for years on the tented field. As such a Republican he most emphatically and earnestly believed in the caucus system as the salvation and strength of his party.

The secretaries, as agreed upon by the candidates, were John Day Smith of Hennepin, C. H. Davis of Renville and W. A. Fleming of Crow Wing. Free Lane was determined to shine early in the fight, and moved to proceed to ballot for a candidate for United States senator, and that the first ballot be an informal one. This was seconded by J. M. Diment of Steele. Senator Edwards of Fillmore suggested that the roll be called and the number of Republicans present be ascertained. Free withdrew his motion temporarily to allow the roll to be called. It was found that there were present the following:

The tellers agreed upon by the conference were then announced, Eric Sevatson of Jackson, George T. Barr of Blue Earth and G. M. Seymour of Washington. Senator Ward of Waseca, who seemed to think that the caucus, thought that it was funny that the tellers were all from the house, but "he was willing to trust the house. They were all good fellows. All he wanted was a free ballot and a fair count." Mr. Lane then renewed his motion, which was carried. Senator Buckman secured recognition and proceeded to name Mr. Sabin. The gentleman opened with a reference to the business interests of the country, their might and importance. It was our business men, he showed in eloquent phases, who were developing the mineral resources of the Vermillion range of this state; who had placed great waterways; who had darkened the skies with the smoke of busy factories.

It is the line of their thoughts, "he said," that I would present to your thoughtful consideration the name of a gentleman who has been identified with these material developments of our country. His name and his record are known, not only throughout our state, but throughout our nation. Coupled with a courage that none dare question; honest in thought and deed, our people know him and need not be told who or what he is. Who more than he could appeal to the best traditions of our party? Who more than he, with our business interests reawakening to hope and prosperity, would strive to link labor and capital hand to hand like twin brothers, to build up our state interests, and aid it in the march of progress and civilization? He has for a long time trodden the perilous heights of public duty. He has heard the low rumbling of the wheels of prejudice, but against him the tide has swept by, and left his record unchallenged; the shafts of envy and hatred that have been aimed at him have been broken at his feet. He is intimate with public affairs—not only with the requirements of the hour, but with the demands of the future. As an employer he has ever held the confidence of his employes as a legislator he has ever been true to the masses: as a man he feels to overflowing the full measure of manhood and life, although the sun of his life has not yet reached noontide. Yet by his integrity he has gained his position in life; by his honest labor has he convinced us that it was right that he should honorably represent our grand old state in the councils of our nation. I would present the name of Dwight M. Sabin of Stillwater."

The name of Senator Sabin was greeted with loud clapping of hands, and with shouts from the gallery, prolonged for several moments. When the noise had subsided Representative A. T. Stebbins of Rochester county arose to second the nomination.

Mr. Sabins nomination was also seconded by Senator Ward of Waseca, Represented Diment of Steele, and speaker Graves, who related how Senator Sabin at the time he was on the very verge of financial ruin, came to his rescue by loaning him money at simple interest thereby enabling him to carry along his business, and get squarely on his feet again.

Representative Morgan of Freeborn county, whose seat was almost immediately in front of the speaker's desk, took the floor to place in nomination the Hon. W. D Washburn.

I present the name, he said, of a distinguished citizen of this commonwealth—one whose name and fame throughout the State of Minnesota are intimately associated with the growth and development of the state; one whose fidelity to the interests of the Republican party has never been brought into question; one in whose hands her interests may safely be trusted. Such a man it is my pleasure to place in nomination, and without a word of disparagement of any of the honorable gentlemen whose names may also be mentioned here, I submit the name of the Hon. W. D. Washburn of Hennepin county.

There was loud cheering both on the floor and in the gallery, accompanied by a round of vigorous hand clapping as the gentleman named his distinguished candidate. Representative C. R. Davis of Nicollett county made the first seconding speech. he was followed by Republicans Crossfield, of Traverse county, Forbes of Lyon county, and Smith of Hennepin county.

Mr. Hompe introduced Mr. Donnelly who had established a reputation as one of the brightest orators and most learned scholars on the face of the globe. He believed that the working people and the farmers of the state were in favor of sending Ignatius Donnelly to the United States senate. He knew that a great deal of slander had been thrown on that gentleman, but it was to be expected that the truth which stands on the mountain top would feel the full fury of the wintry blasts. [Applause.]

"It is not," he continued, "by wealth, but by his own transcendent genius that the gentleman I have the honor to nominate has obtained his great reputation. He has written his name upon the imperishable scroll of fame, and his memory after he has passed away will be a household word with generations yet unborn."

Here the gentleman's speech was interrupted by an outburst of cheers and applause that was nearly deafening. But laughter mingled with the other demonstrations and it was evident that the audience was bent on enjoying itself. After this wild whoop was over Mr. Hompe proceeded.

He alluded to the alleged inconsistences in Mr. Donnelly's political career, but eloquently pointed to the fact that while in congress at a critical period the gentlemen was true to the cause of the nation and supported all measures that tended to strengthen it. Donnelly stood, he said, "like the Rock of Ages" in opposition to President Johnson and his plans. He also spoke of the manner in which Donnelly stood by Mr. Merriam, the present governor of the state, when he was assailed with calumny. Donnelly had always been true to the interests of the people of the state of Minnesota, wherever else he may not have seemed consistent.

The nomination of Donnelly was seconded by Messrs. McGrath of Dakota county, and Mr. Sevatson of Jackson, but neither of these gentlemen took up any of the time of the caucus with speeches.

There being no further nominations the caucus immediately proceeded to ballot.

Stanley is Heard From.

The following letter, written by Henry M Stanley, has been received in Brussels,

Boma of Bonalva, Muretia, Aug 17.—To Sheikh Hamed-ben Mahomed; from his good friend Henry M. Stanley: Many salaams to you. I hope you are in as good health as I am, and that you have remained in good health since I left the Congo. I have much to say to you, but hope I shall see you face to face before many days. I reached here this morning with 130 wangwana, three soldiers and sixty-six natives belonging to Emin Pasha. It is now eighty-two days since I left Emin Pasha on the Nyanza. I lost three men on the way. Two were drowned and the other decamped. I found the white men who were looking for Emin Pasha quite well. The other white man, Casati, is also well. Emin Pasha has ivory in abundance, thousands of cattle and sheep, goats and fowls, and food of all kinds. I found him a very good and kind man. He gave all our white and black men numbers of things. His liberality could not be excelled. His soldiers blessed our black men for their kindness in coming so far to show them the way. Many of them were ready to follow me out of the country, but I asked them to stay quiet a few months, that I might return and fetch the other men and goods left at Yambunga. They prayed to God that he would give me strength to finish my work. May their prayers be heard. And now, my friend, what are you going to do? We have gone the rode twice over. We know where it is good, where there is plenty of food and where there is none; where all the camps are and where we shall sleep and rest. I am waiting to hear your words. If you go with me it is well; I leave it to you I will stay here ten days and will then proceed slowly. I will move hence to Big Island, two hours' march from here, above this place There are plenty of houses and plenty of food for the men. Whatever you have to say to me, my ears are open, with a good heart, as it has always been toward you. Therefore, if you come, come quickly, for on the eleventh morning from this I shall move on All my white men are well, but I left them all behind except my servant William, who is with me.

HENRY M. STANLEY.

Sheikh Hamed-ben-Mahomed, to whom the above letter is addressed, is the Arab Tippoo Tib. The letter, which was taken to Stanley Falls by a messenger, and which reached Brussels by post last night, is the only one from Stanley which reached the coast of Africa. A number of other letters, which the messenger conveyed to Stanley Falls, still remain there, but it is expected that they will arrive in Europe in two or three months.

William Bremen of Barnesville was convicted of seduction on the complaint of Miss Julia Chaffee. In the case of Thomas Brown, charged with the murder of Policeman Poul a special venire of forty jurors and a regular panel were exhausted. Eleven jurors were accepted, and the court ordered a special venire of twenty additional jurors.

The lately organized river pilots, association held at Lansing, at which all officers and directors were present It was resolved to memorialize congress for the appointment of practical pilots on the board for the locating of bridges; for the immediate notice from the light house department of any changes in signals; for the rigid enforcement of laws in regard to issuing licenses, and that signer of application for license shall have personal knowledge of the ability of the applicant. Among the plans for the diffusion of information proposed is the establishment of boxes at various points where information regarding channel, water, etc., may be deposited for the use of all pilots.

The United States supreme court rendered an opinion in the case of Frank M. Dent, plaintiff in error, versus the State of West Virginia, in error to the supreme court of appeals of the State of West Virginia. Dent was convicted of unlawfully engaging in the practice of medicine with a diploma in violation of a statute of the state which requires every practitioner of medicine to obtain a certificate from the state board of health that he is a graduate of a reputable medical college, or that he has practiced medicine in the state continuously for ten years, or that he has been found upon examination by the board to be qualified to practice medicine. Dent appealed the case to the state court of appeals, asserting that the act was unconstitutional, inasmuch as it deprived him of liberty and property without due process of law contrary to the fourteenth amendment of the constitution. The court of appeals gave judgment against Dent and this court affirms that decision.

American couples about to travel in Austria ought to take with them their marriage certificates. An American lady recently gave birth to a child here, and the father, accompanied by witnesses, went to register the birth. Owing to the absence of a marriage certificate, the clerk said he must record the birth as illigitimate, and the only concession made, after much expostulation, was the substitution of the word "doubtful" for "illigitimate." On being told that the parents belonged to the Angelican church the clerk wrote down "No religion."

The St. James Gazette in an article on the Sackville incident says: "Lord Salisbury is undoubtedly right on the question of principle. Lord Sackville spoke when he ought to have been silent, and told the truth to the wrong person. This, however, does not excuse President Cleveland's treatment of Lord Sackville, but it does not afford a solid reason for placing the latter in a position where he will run less risk from the wiles of a deceiver." The Globe says: "The correspondence concerning the Sackville case carries the subject beyond a merely personal incident, and renders it much more important. The argument that the retention of a foreign envoy is a question solely for the government to which the envoy is accredited to decide, is an assumption fraught with the possibility of serious results."

E. F. Osborne & Co. of St. Paul made an assignment recently in favor of James G. Freeman. The firm had been in financial straits for some time past, and the assignment was hastened by a suit brought by Fairbanks, Morse & Co. An affidavit has been filed that the amount of the assigned stock does not exceed $25,000. The firm is composed of Eugene F. Osborne and John Townsend.

Two of the men who took the places of the forty striking weavers at the Monument mills in Housatonic, Mass., were attacked recently on their way home by fifteen masked men, who said they were White, and who beat them until insensible and left them in the road. The two victims finally reached home and, though seriously injured, will recover. The affair causes much excitement and more trouble is feared.

THE DAY OF REST.

Rev. Talmage Discourses in Favor of a Proper Observance of the Sabbath Day.

A Doleful Day of Rest Deprecated--The Church of God Regarded as One Vast Hosanna.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Jan. 13.—Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., preached to-day on "A Bright Sunday vs. a Doleful Sunday." After expounding appropriate passages of scripture, he gave out the hymn:

"Welcome, sweet day of rest,
That saw the Lord arise."

The text was: "And call the Sabbath a delight."—Isaiah lviii, 13. Dr. Talmage said:

There is an element of gloom striking through all false religions. Paganism is a brood of horrors. The god of Confucius frowned upon its victims with blind fate. Mohammedanism promises nothing to those exhausted with sin in this world, but an eternity of the same passional indulgencies. But God intended that our religion should have the grand characteristic of cheerfulness. St. Paul struck the keynote when he said, "Rejoice evermore, and again I say rejoice." This religion has no spikes for the feet, it has no hooks for the shoulder; it has no long pilgrimage to take; it has no funeral pyres on which to leap; it has no juggernauts before which to fall. Its good cheer is symbolized in the Bible by the brightness of waters, and the redolence of lillies, and the sweetness of music, and the hilarities of a banquet. A Choir of Seraphim of archangel are to celebrate its chanted at its induction and, pealing trumpet, and wanting palm, and flapping wing triumphs. It began its chief mission with the shout, "Glory be to God in the highest!" and it will close its earthly mission with the ascription: "Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!"

But men have said our religion is not cheerful, because we have such a doleful Sabbath. They say. "You can have your religious assemblages, and your long faces, and your sniffling cant, and psalm books, and your Bibles. Give us the Sunday excursion, and the horse race, and the convivial laughter. We have so much joy that we want to spread it all over the seven days of the week, and you shall not have one of our days of worldly satisfaction for religious dolefulness." I want to show these men—if there are any such in the house this morning—that they are under a great delusion, and that God intended the 52 Sundays of the year to be hung up like bells in a to wer, beating a perpetual chime of joy and glory and salvation and heaven, for I want you to carry out the idea of the text, "and call the Sabbath a delight."

I remark, in the first place, we are to find in this way the joy of healthy repose. In this democratic country we all have to work—some with hand, some with brain, some with foot. If there is in all this house a hand that has not, during the past year, been stretched forth to some kind of toil, let it be lifted. Not one, not one. You sell the goods. You teach the school. You doctor in the sick-room. You practice at the bar. You edit a newspaper. You tan the hides. You preach the gospel. You mend the shoes. You sit at the shuttle. You carry the hod of bricks up the ladder on the wall. And the one occupation is as honorable as the other, provided God calls you to it. I care not what you do, if you only do it well. But when Saturday night comes, you are jaded and worn. The hand can not so skillfully manufacture; the eye can not see as well; the brain is not so clear; the judgment is not so well balanced. A prominent manufacturer told me that he could see a difference between the goods which went out of his establishment on Saturday from the goods that went out on Monday. He said: "They were very different indeed. Those that were made in the former part of the week, because of the rest that had been previously given, were better than those that were made in the latter part of the week, when the men were tired out." The Sabbath comes, and it bathes the soreness from the limbs, quiets the agitated brain, and puts out the fires of anxiety that have been burning all the week. Our bodies are seven-day clocks, and unless on the seventh day they are wound up, they run down into the grave. The Sabbath was intended as a savings bank; into it we are to gather the resources upon which we are to draw all the week. That man who breaks the Sabbath robs his own nerve, his own muscle, his own brain, his own bones. He dips up the wine of his own life, and throws it away. He who breaks the Lord's day gives a mortgage to disease and death upon his entire physical estate, and at the most unexpected moment that mortgage will be foreclosed, and the soul ejected from the premises. Every gland, and pore, and cell, and finger-nail demands the seventh day for repose. The respirations of the lungs, the throb of the pulse in the wrist, the motion of the bone in its socket declare: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." There are thousands of men who have had their lives dashed out against the golden gates of the Sabbath. A prominent London merchant testifies that 30 years ago he went to London. He says: "I have during that time watched minutely, and I have noticed that the men who went to business on the Lord's day, or opened their counting houses, have, without a single exception, come to failure." A prominent Christian merchant in Boston says: I find it don't pay to work on Sunday. When I was a boy I noticed out on Long Wharf there were merchants who loaded their vessels on Sabbath day, keeping their men busy from morn till night; and it is my observation that they themselves came to nothing—these merchants—and their children came to nothing. It doesn't pay," he says, "to work on the Sabbath.

I appeal to your observation. Where are the men who 20 years ago were Sabbath breakers, and who have been Sabbath breakers ever since? Without a single exception, you will tell me, they have come either to financial or to moral beggary. I defy you to point out a single exception, and you can take the whole world for your field. It has been either a financial or moral defalcation in every instance. Six hundred and forty physicians in London petition parliament, saying: "We must have the Sabbath obeyed. We can not have health in this city and in this nation unless the Sabbath is observed." "Those in our own country have given evidence on the same side. The man who takes down the shutters of his store on the Sabbath takes down the curse of Almighty God. That farmer who cultures his ground on the Sabbath day raises a crop of neuralgia, and of consumption, and of death. A farmer said, "I defy your Christian Sabbath. I will raise a sunday crop." So he went to work and plowed the ground on Sunday, and harrowed it on Sunday, and he planted corn on Sunday, and he reaped the corn on Sunday, and he gathered it into the barn on Sunday. "There," he said, "I have proved to you that all this idea about a fatality accompanying Sabbath work is a perfect sham. My corn is garnered, and all is well." But before many weeks passed the Lord God struck that barn with his lightning and away went the Sunday crop.

So great is the moral depression coming upon those who toil upon the Sabbath day, that you may have noticed (if you have not, I call your attention to the fact) that in cases where the public interest demands Sabbath toil the moral depression is so great that there are but few who can stand it. For instance, the police service, without which not one of our houses would be safe—there are very few who can stand the pressure and temptation of it. In London, there were 5,000 policemen, the statistics showed that in one year 921 of that 5,000 were dismissed, 523 were suspended, and 2,492 were fined. Now, if the moral depression be so great in occupations that are positively necessary for the safety of society, I ask you what must be the moral depression in those occupations where there is no necessity for Sabbath work, man chooses worldly business on the Lord's day just because he likes it, or wants to add to his emolument? During the late war, it was found out that those works which paused on the seventh day turned out more war material than those which worked all the seven days. Mr. Bagnall, a prominent iron merchant, gives this testimony: I find we have fewer accidents in our establishment and fewer interruptions, now we observe the Lord's day; and at the close of the year, now that we keep the Sabbath, I find we turn out more iron and have larger profits than any year when we worked all the seven days." The fact is, Sabbath-made ropes will break, and Sabbath-made shoes will leak, and Sabbath-made coats will rip, and Sabbath occupations will be blasted. A gentleman said; "I invented a shuttle on the Lord's day. I was very busy, so I made the model of that new shuttle on the Lord's day. So very busy was I during the week that I had to occupy many Sabbaths. It was a great success. I enlarged my buildings, I built new factories, and made hundreds of thousands of dollars; but I have to tell you that all the result of that work on the Sabbath has been to me ruin. I enlarged my buildings, I made a great many thousands of dollars, but I have lost all, and I charge it to the fact of that Sunday shuttle." I will place in two companies the men in this community who break the Sabbath and the men who keep it, and then I ask you who are the best friends of society? Who are the best friends of morals? Who have the best prospects for this world? Who have the best for the world that is to come?

Sabbath morning comes in the household. I suppose that the mere philosopher would say that the Sabbath lights comes in waves current, just like any other light; but it does not seem so to me. It seems as if it touched the eyelids more gently, and threw a brighter glow on the mantel ornaments, and cast a better cheerfulness on the faces of the children, and drew a supernatural glory over the old family Bible. Hail! Sabbath light! We rejoice in it. Rest comes in through the window, or it leaps up from the fire, or it rolls out in the old arm chair, or it catches up the body into ecstasy and swings open before the soul the 12 gates which are 12 pearls. The bar of the unfastened store window, the quiet of the commercial warehouse seem to say "This is the day the Lord hath made." Rest for the sewing women, with weary hands, and aching sides, and sick heart. Rest for the overtaxed workmen in the mine, or out on the wall, or in the sweltering factory. Hang up the plane, drop the adz, slip the band from the wheel, put out the fire. Rest for the body, for the mind, and for the soul.

"Welcome, sweet day of rest,
That saw the Lord arise;
Welcome to this reviving breast,
And these rejoicing eyes."

Again I remark, we ought to have in the Sabbath the joy of domestic reunion and consecration. There are some very good parents who have the faculty of making the Sabbath a great gloom. Their children run up against the wall of parental lugubriousness on that day. They are sorry when Sunday comes, and glad when it goes away. They think of everything bad on that day. It is the worst day to them, really, in all the week. There are persons who, because they were brought up in Christian families where there were wrong notions about the Sabbath, have gone out into dissipation and will be lost. A man said to me: "I have a perfect disgust for the Sabbath day. I never saw my father smile on Sunday. It was such a dreadful day to me when I was a boy. I never got over it, and never will." Those parents did not "call the Sabbath a delight;" they made it a gloom. But there are houses represented here this morning where the children say through the week: "I wonder when Sunday will come!" They are anxious to have it come. I hear their hosanna in the house; I hear their hosanna in the school. God intended the sabbath to be especially a day for the father. The mother is home all the week. Sabbath day comes, and God says to the father, who has been busy from Monday morning to Saturday night at the store, or away from home: "This is your day. See what you can do in this little flock in preparing them for heaven. This day I set apart for you." You know very well that there are many parents who are mere suttlers of the household; they provide the food and raiment; once in awhile, perhaps, they hear the child read a line or two in the new primer; or, if there be a case of especial discipline, and the mother can not imagine it, the child is brought up in the court martial of the father's discipline and punished. That is all there is of it. No scrutiny of that child's immortal interests, no realizing of the fact that the child will soon be out in the world where there are gigantic and overwhelming temptations that have swamped millions. But in some households it is not that way; the home, beautiful on ordinary days, is more beautiful now that the Sabbath has dawned. There is more joy in the "good-morning," there is more tenderness in the morning prayer. The father looks at the child, and the child looks at the father. The little one dares now to ask questions without any fear of being answered: "Don't bother me—I must be off to the store." Now he father looks at the child, and he sees not merely the blue eyes, the arched brow, the long lashes, the sweet lip. He sees in that child a long line of earthly destinies; he sees in that childan immensurable eternity. As he touches that child, he says: "I wonder what will be the destiny of this little one?" And while this Christian father is thinking and praying, the sweet promise flows through his soul: "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." And he feels a joy, not like that which sounds in the dance, or is wafted from the froth of the winecup, or that which is like the "crackling of thorns under a pot," but the joy of domestic reunion and consecration,

Have I been picturing something that is merely fanciful, or is it it possible for you and for me to have such a home as that? I believe it is possible.

I have a statistic that I would like to give you. A great many people, you know, say there is nothing in the Christian discipline of a household. In New Hampshire there are two neighborhoods—the one of six families, the other of five families. The six families disregarded the Sabbath. In time, five of these families were broken up by the separation of husbands and wives; the other by the father becoming a thief. Eight or nine of the parents became drunkards, one committed suicide, and all came to penury. Of some 40 or 50 descendants, about 20 are known to be drunkards, and gamblers and dissolute. Four or five have been in state prison. One fell in a duel. Some are in the almshouse. Only one became a Christain, and he after first having been outrageously dissipated. The other five families that regarded the Sabbath were all prospered. Eight or 10 of the children are consistent members of the church. Some of them became officers in the church; one is a minister of the gospel; one is a missionary to China. No poverty among any of them. The homestead is now in the hands of the third generation. Those who have died have died in peace of the gospel. Oh, is there nothing in a household that remembers God's holy day? Can it be possible that those who disregard this holy commandment can be prospered for this life, or have any good hope of the life that is to come?

Again, we ought to have in the Sabbath the joy of Christian assemblage. Where are all those people going on the Sabbath? You see them moving up and down the street. Is it a festival day? people might ask. Has there been some public edict commanding the people to come forth? No, they are only worshippers of God who are going to their places of religious service. In what delicate scale shall I weigh the joy of Christian convocation? It gives brightness to the eye, and a flush to the cheek, and a pressure to the head, and a thrill to the heart. You see the aged man tottering along on his staff through the aisle. You see the little child led by the hand of its mother. You look around and rejoice that this is God's day, and this the communion of saints. "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." Some familar tune sets all the soul a-quiver and a-quake with rapture. We plunge into some old hymn, and all our cares and anxieties are bathed off. The glorious gospel transports us, the spirit descends, Jesus appears, and we feel the bounding, spreading, electric joy of Christian convocation.

I look upon the Church of God as one vast hosanna. Joy dripping from the baptismal font, joy glowing in the sacramental cup, joy warbling in the anthem, joy beating against the gate of heaven with a hallelujah like the voice of mighty thunderings. Beautiful for situation! The joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion. It is the day and the place where Christ reviews his troops, bringing the battalions, riding along the line, examining the battle-torn flags of past conflict and cheering them on to future victories. Oh, the joy of Christian assemblage!

I remark also, we are to have in this day the joy of eternal Sabbatism. I do not believe it possible for any Christian to spend the Lord's day here without thinking of heaven. There is something in the gathering of people in church on earth to make one think of the rapt assemblage of the skies. There is something in the song of the Christian Church to make one think of the song of the elders from the throne, the harpists and the trumpeters of God accompanying the harmony. The light of a better Sabbath gilds the top of this, and earth and heaven come within speaking distance of each other, the song of triumph waving backward and forward, now tossed up by the church of the earth, now sent back by the church of heaven.

"Day of all the week the best,
Emblem of eternal rest."

The Christian man stands radiant in its light. His bereft heart rejoices at the thought of a country where there is neither a coffin nor grave; his weary body glows at the idea of a land where there are no burdens to carry, and no exhaustive journeys to take. He eats the grapes of Eshcol. He stands upon the mountain top and looks off the promised land. He hears the call of the eternal towers and the tramp of the multitude with sins forgiven. This is the day which the Lord hath made. Let us rejoice and be glad in it. Oh, ye, who have been hunting for Sunday pleasures in the street, and on the river bank, and in the houses of sin. I commend to you this holy day and holy service! I do not invite you to swallow a great bitterness or to carry a heavy yoke; but I invite you to feel in body, mind and soul the thrill of joy which God has handed down in the chalices of the golden Sabbath.

With what revulsion and with what pity we must look out on that large class of persons in our day who would throw discredit upon the Lord's day. There are two things which Christain people ought never to give up; the one is the Bible, the other is the Sabbath. Take away one and you take both. Take either, and farewell Christianity in this country, farewell to our civil and religious liberties. When they go, all go. He who has ever spent Sunday in Paris or Antwerp, or Rome, if he be an intelligent Christain, will pray God that the day will never come when the Sabbath of continental Europe shall put its foot upon our shores. I had a friend in Syracuse who lived to be 100 years of age. He said to me in his 99th year: "I went across the mountains in the early history of this country. Sabbath morning came. We were beyond the reach of civilization. My comrades were all going out for an excursion. I said: "No, I wont go: it is Sunday.' Why, they laughed. They said, 'We haven't any Sunday here.' 'Oh, yes,' I said, 'you have.' I brought it with me over the mountains.'"

There are two or three ways in which we can war against Sabbath-breaking usuages in this day; and the first thing is to get our children right upon this subject, and teach them that the Sabbath day is the holiest of all the days, and the best and the gladdest. Unless you teach your child under the paternal roof to keep the Lord's day, there are 990 chances out of a thousand it will never learn to keep the Sabbath. You may think to shirk responsibility in the matter, and send your child to the Sabbath school and the house of God; that will not relieve the matter. I want to tell you in the name of Christ, my Maker and Judge, that your example will be more potential than any instruction they get elsewhere; and if you disregard the Lord's day yourself, or in any wise throw contempt upon it, you are blasting your children with an infinite curse. It is a rough truth, I know, told in a rough way; but it is God's truth, nevertheless. Your child may go on to 70 or 80 years of age, but the child will never get over the awful disadvantage of having a Sabbath-breaking mother. It is the joy of many of us that we can look back to an early home where God was honored, and when the Sabbath came it was a day of great consecration and joy. We remember the old faces around the table that Sabbath morning. Our hearts melt when we think of those blessed associations, and we may have been off and committed many indiscretions and done many wrong things; but the day will never come when we forget the early home in which God's day was regarded, and father and mother told us to keep holy that Sabbath.

There is another way in which we can war against the Sabbath-breaking usages of the country at this time, and that is by making our houses of worship attractive and the religious services inspiring. I plead not for a gorgeous audience chamber; I plead not for groined rafters or magnificent fresco; but I do plead for comfortable churches home-like churches—places where the church-going population behave as they ought. Make the church welcome to all, however poorly clad may be, or whatever may have been their past history; for I think the church of God is not so much made for you who could have churches in your own house, but for the vast population of our great cities who are treading on toward death, with no voice of mercy to arrest them. Ah! when the prodigal comes into the church do not stare at him as though he had no right to come. Give him the best seat you can find for him. Sometimes a man wakes up from his sin, and he says: "I'll go to the house of God." Perhaps he comes from one motive, perhaps from another. He finds the church dark and the Christian people frigid (and there are no people on earth who can be more frigid than Christian people when they try) and the music is dull, and he never comes again. Suppose one of these men enters the church. As he comes in he hears a song which his mother sang when he was a boy; he remembers it. He sits down and some one hands him a book, open at "Jerusalem my happy home,

Name ever dear to me."

"Yes," he says, "I have heard that many times." He sees cheerful Christian people there, every mans face a psalm of thanksgiving to God. He says: "Do you have this so every Sunday? I have heard that the house of God was a doleful place, and Christians were lugubrious, and repelling! I have really enjoyed myself!" The next Sabbath the man is again found in the same place. Tears of repentance start down his cheek; he begins to pray; and when the communion table is spread, he sits at it, and some one reaches over and says; I am surprised to find you here. I thought you didn't believe in such things." "Ah!" he says, I have been captured. I came one day, and I found you were all so loving and cheerful here that I concluded I would come among you. Where thou goest I will go; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried."

Ah! You can't drive men out of their sins, but you can coax them out—you can charm them out.

I would to God that we could all come to a higher appreciation of this sabbath heritage! We can not count the treasures of one Christian Sabbath. It spreads out over us the two wings of the arch angel of mercy. Oh, blessed Sabbath! blessed Sabbath! They scoff a great deal about the old Puritanic Sabbaths, and there is a wonderful amount of wit expended upon that subject now—the Sabbath they used to have in New England

I never lived in New England, but I would rather trust the old Puritanic Sabbath, with all its faults, than this modern Sabbath, which is fast becoming no Sabbath at all. If our modern Sabbathism shall produce as stalwart Christian character as the old New England Puritanic Sabbathism, I shall be satisfied and I shall be surprised.

Oh, blessed day! blessed day! I should like to die some Sabbath morning when the air is full of church music and the bells are ringing. Leaving my home group with a dying blessing, I should like to look off upon some Christian assemblage chanting the praises of God as I went up to join the one hundred and forty and four thousand and the thousands of thousands standing around the throne of Jesus. Hark! I hear the bell of the old kirk on the hill side of heaven. It is a wedding bell, for behold the bridegroom cometh. It is a victor's bell, for we are more than conquerors through Him who has loved us. It is a Sabbath bell, for it calls the nations of earth and heaven to everlasting repose.

"Oh when, thou city of my God
Shall I thy courts ascend?
Where congregations ne'er break up,
And Sabbaths have no end."

A Picture for an Art Gallery.

Happening to glance into the windows of a stylish equipage going down 5th avenue recently I was astonished at seeing its occupant—a handsome girl, evidently of the upper ten—leaning back on the cushions, with half-closed eyes, enjoying a — cigar! She wasn't a Cuban or a Spanish girl, either, but a fair-skinned New Yorker. Such as one sees every day on our promenades. Gum is bad enough, to be sure, but beauty with a Henry Clay alight and filling a coach with smoke is a picture for an art gallery.—New York Star.

THE FARM.

Agricultural Notes.

The lines of safety in farming and self-denial run parallel and not far apart.

Stopping the airholes in the stables is equivalent to stopping leaks in the grainbin.

W. L. Lynch, the Canadian butter expert, who has been traveling in Denmark and other countries of Europe, says that the Danish butter-makers' success is due to frequent churning and excellent care of the cream, which is obtained artifically and with a finer product than under the old system.

In the same litter of pigs some will be larger than others. Some will fatten readily, while others just as thrifty will grow long and large in fame with less fat. These last, whether male or female, should be reserved for breeding. Feed has something to do with this, but individual peculiarities of different animals has quite as much—American Cultivator.

Last winter I fed five cows, most of them giving milk, and their regular grain ration was ten pounds of bran and corn and cob meal, mixed in the proportion of about four pounds of bran to six of the meal. I never had cows do better, or come to the spring with smoother coats, and any one of them would have made good beef in April.—Waldo F. Brown.

If one wants all the milk that can be got from a cow without any reference to its quality, then juicy grass, green corn fodder, brewers' grains, turnips or other roots that have a large proportion of water, warm mashes and sloppy food in general will produce it. A constant moist diet will unquestionably produce more milk than a dry one.

Carrots and parsnips for stock feeding or any other purpose are more tender if sown as late as June. The soil being warm they grow quicker than the early sown. The objections to late sowing are a liability to suffer from drought and the sharp competition with weeds when the plants are young and feeble.

Leonard Johnson, of Northfield Minn., won several prizes at the National Fat Stock Show in Chicago. The Percheron Stallion Gilbert was awarded second premium in class of four years or over, and Francois, in class of two years and under three, took first premium. The Percheron mare Norma, two and under three years, won first premium.

Ninety-nine times out of a hundred the wives of absolutely shiftless farmers are ever patient slaves who carry the whole family upon their overladen backs all the way up the steep ascent of life. They work and found fault with by their fretful husbands who did not take enough exercise to properly regulate their digestive organs.

Orin Ballon brought in a dressed hog weighing 405 pounds, and only fourteen months old. A citizen remarked that he had bought a dressed hog a short time ago, eighteen months old, and only weighed 162 pounds. This is a remarkable difference in weight and shows a difference in the kinds of hogs raised and in the care they get.—Leader, Long Prairie, Minn.

Benzine for Destroying White Grubs.

In an experiment recently made by one of the French forest officers and reported at a meeting of the National Agricultural Society, the white (larvæ of the May or dor bug), which so often do universal damage in dry seasons to strawberry plants, &c, on twelve acres were destroyed with benzine at a cost of only $3.20 per acre. Holes were made in the ground infested with the grubs with one of the sharp iron dibbles used sometimes in transplanting small plants and the benzine was poured into them. Fifty grains of benzine were used to the square yard and care was taken to insert it above the plane of the feeding ground of the grubs.

Points in Butter Making.

In every 100 pounds of milk, besides 86 or 87 pounds of water, there are 4 pounds of sugar and 4 pounds of cheesy matter in which there are an enormous number of small round globules which contain the butter fat. Such a fluid is particularly liable to ferment and decompose. Consequently the whole system of butter-making must be directed to keeping the globules in a state of utmost purity, otherwise the butter will not be pure or likely to keep. Cleanliness and pure air in the stables are indispensable, also pure water and proper food.

Neither roots, linseed cake, cotton cake or grain should be given in too large quantities to cows whose milk is to be made into butter. The quantity of food supplied should be regulated somewhat by the quantity of milk received, In other words, the cow that gave the smallest quantity should not be fed as liberally as the one that produced considerably more. The dairy-room should be free from the slightest smell. The cows should be kept comfortable and not be annoyed by dogs or driven rapidly, or forced to walk long distances. The utmost cleanliness in milking should be observed. Shallow pans were the most common for setting, but in winter deep setting was better. For large quantities the mechanical separator produced the best results. The process of ripening the cream should stop short of souring. Butter colored with carrots or annatto should not be expected to keep. From forty to fifty revolutions per minute in the churn are enough. The butter should be taken out with a wooden scoop and not with the hands. In working and salting the grain of the butter should not be broken.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Hints for the Home

A salt ham should be soaked over night in plenty of soft water previous to boiling.

After washing a wooden bowl place it where it will dry equally on all sides; away from the stove.

When watering potted plants in winter do not pour the water in the crown of the plants, but simply moisten the earth in the pots. Too much moisture will do more injury than benefit.

For a cough boil one ounce of flaxseed in a pint of water, strain and add a little honey, one ounce of rock candy, and the juice of three lemons; mix and boil well. Drink as hot as possible.

To remove stains from marble, mix a quantity of the strongest soap lees with quicklime to the consistency of milk; lay it on the marble, and let it be for twenty-four hours, then clean with soap and water.

If butter is kept covered tight when put in the ice-chest, it will not absorb the odor of any food lying near. There is nothing so sensitive as butter, and yet you may see it at any time placed near to meat or vegetables.

To keep lamp chimneys from breaking put a cloth in the bottom of a large pan, fill the latter with cold water, and place the new chimney in it; cover the pan and let its contens boil one hour, then take from fire and let the chimney remain in the water until it is cold.

An inexpensive and good desert is made of one quart of sweet milk, two-thirds of a cup of uncooked rice, and a little salt. Put this in tea or coffee cups, set them in the steamer over a kettle of boiling water, Let it cook until the rice is almost like jelly; When cold turn it out of the cup. Serve with sugar and cream, or with pudding sauce.

The secret of making good tea is that the water should be poured on the instant it boils, and that everything should be well heated. If you have a little water boiled in a kettle, and pour this upon the tea in a cold teapot, the water is chilled, the strength of the tea not properly extracted, and, after standing the necessary time, it is, when poured out, but little more than lukewarm.

How To Save the Eyesight.

Neither colored goods nor flannels should be boiled.

All goods in barrels—apples, beef, potatoes, etc.—keep better when laid down on their side.

Paint the kitchen floor with boiled linseed oil, and you won't have much trouble thereafter cleaning it.

For cleaning brass use a thin paste of plate powder, two tablespoonfuls of vinegar, four tablespoonfuls of alcohol. Rub with a piece of flannel; polish with chamois.

Next to the sunlight the incandescent light gives the best illumination for reading, and all notions of the injurious effect on the eyes of the electric light are erroneous.

The vast majority of people who wear glasses can see well without them. They use them to avoid a constant strain on the eyes. The act of focalization is a muscular one and uses up nervous energy.

The nearsighted child should wear spectacles, because they are the best preventive against increase of nearsightedness, and also because he loses a great part of his education in not being able to see more than a few feet away.

For the eyes in a healthy state there is but one safe wash—pure cold water. When the eyelids are inflamed the best lotion is a weak solution of salt water. Never apply poultices to the eyes or use "eye waters" without the advice of a physician.

An Artistic Rag Rug.

The prettiest rugs which are made in this country are the home-made rag rugs woven of different colored woolen rags. These rugs are usually woven in stripes at either end, and in a medley of varied colors in the centre. The weaver also introduces a lengthwise striped effect by using different-colored warp. Very pretty effects are produced by stripes of dull yellow and dull red warp in alternating bands about two inches wide. The warp is knotted, and forms a fringe at either end of the rug. Small rugs, 34x70 inches and 34x48 inches, are suitable to strew about a small room over matting. Rugs of rags woven in this manner, but large enough to cover the center of the room, are often seen in artistically furnished rooms, where the paintings and bric-a-brac suggest the cultured taste of the owner. These rugs when well selected in color approach nearer in beauty to the blending tones of the costly Eastern carpet than any of the various imitations of them made in this country.—Chicago Ledger.

A Word for the "Old Maid."

A thoughtful writer, speaking of the growing willingness of women to go through life unmarried, says: "Once it was considered a bad thing to be an old maid, and light-minded people made fun of one. Now it is different. Some of the highest and prettiest women become so much interested in the serious work of life that they regard husbands altogether unnecessary inconveniences. They are satisfied with the state of single blessedness and appear to be just as happy and useful as their married sisters. It is all right. If a woman remains single it is her own affair and out siders need not concern themselves about it. As a rule, an old maid is an intellectual and interesting woman."

In Paris, France, a big company has a monopoly of the funerals. This company handles 50,000 bodies yearly.

The Czar of Russia recently picked up 700 pounds of steel in a Petershoff gun factory. The workers cheered.

Some of the brick houses built in England 200 years ago are so cemented together that the walls have to be blown down with gunpowder when it is desired to erect new buildings.

About $50,000 was turned into the conscience fund of the United States treasury during the year 1888. Measuring by dollars, there was just double the amount of conscience in this country last year over the record of any previous year in the history of the government.

Rider Haggard, the author of "She" and other things, has discarded meat and become a vegetarian, in order to stimulate the imagination. His readers had not discovered any alarming tendency toward realism or the possible.

The movement to put women on an equality with men before the law appears to be gathering strength in Pennsylvania likewise. The Governor of that state has appointed a day for the execution of a woman murderer, just the same as if she were a man. Let there be no distinction on account of sex!

The Argentine Republic has borrowed $185,000 in Europe in the past twelve months and the conservative money lenders of the East are getting rattled. The amount of debt contracted within the year exceeds the entire internal and national indebtedness two years ago. A country which hasn't got beyond raising a horse for his hide ought to go slow.

The Safety Valve tells about a novel and beautiful watch that is being manufactured for presentation to Mrs. Harrison. The case plates are of transparent Brazilian pebble or rock crystal. Holes are drilled in the crystal plates for the screws and fittings. The pivots are set in rubies and sapphires, and the plates are held apart by sapphire pillows.

Steve Brodie, one of New York's great men, is to take another leap. The people are rather tired of having Brodie leap and escape uninjured when everybody prophesied that he would be killed. But Brodie now proposes to make the leap into the Genesee river where Sam Patch was killed. It is not a deep river and he may strike bottom.

Philadelphia continues to maintain her record as a city where home life is appreciated. Nearly 6,000 two-story dwellings calculated for the use of a single family each were erected there last year. In these days of flats, where children are not allowed, such a record ought not only to push Philadelphia ahead in population, but also to perpetuate her name of the "City of Brotherly Love."

Le Grande B. Cannon, one of the directors of the Delaware and Hudson R. R. Company, says the only way to stop rate wars is to employ honest men as freight and passenger agents. This would revolutionize the whole railroad business with a vengeance. The genial agents of the warring corporations are the best fellows to be found anywhere and would scorn to do a dishonorable act to a fellow-man, but when it comes to railroad business they construe the word honesty to mean faithful endeavor to get traffic—by fair means if possible, but anyhow, to get it. Thus they serve their employers as they have been trained to serve them.

Apartment houses have become very fashionable in London. The correspondent of the Liverpool Mercury writes: "I do not think that even yet people recognize what an enormous revolution is being wrought in the conceptions of fashionable London about the home. It was an axiom but yesterday that it was the ambition of every Englishman to have his own front door. Our ideal was a wholly-detached mansion, and some people would have liked to place a moat around their residence, and to have protected the entrance by a portcullis and drawbridge. But all this is changed. The flat system is spreading everywhere. It was thought just good enough for artisans when the model dwelling-house movement was just started. Now the ambition of people seems to be to dwell on a flat in an aristocratic neighborhood.

THE NEWS RESUME.

The Cream of the News Gleaned From the Latest Associated Press Telegrams.

About Washington.

The American Window Glass Manufacturers' association met at Washington in secret session. No schedule of prices was fixed and no action was taken or contemplated, it was stated that the discounts fixed at the last meeting had been forced up by increased importations, and if continued would compel American manufacturers either to reduce wages or go out of business.

The Washington Evening Critic published a long account of outrages upon citizens of Alexandria, Va., by a band of White Caps that was recently formed there. The Critic has received a notification from the lord chief of the White Caps that if the paper did not stop meddling with that organization the editor would be chastised with thirty-nine lashes on his bare back.

The Casualty Calendar.

The plant of the Beloit Cabinet Company has been destroyed by fire. A heavy wind was blowing at the time and other property was injured. McIntosh, the superintendent, narrowly escaped. Loss, $7,000; insurance, $3,000. The works will be rebuilt.

Talk About People.

Francis G. Haley of Pomona, formerly of New York, was the author of the Murchison letter. The object of the recent official announcement that Osgoodby wrote the letter is said to have been to divert public attention from Haley, as it was feared that the administration would not care to openly reward the writer of the letter.

Gov. Beaver of Pennsylvania, chief marshal of the inaugural parade, has issued the following order: "Having accepted the invitation of the committee in charge of the inaugural ceremonies attending the inauguration of Gen. Benjamin Harrison, as president of the United States, to act as chief marshal of the inaugural procession, the following appointment is announced; chief of staff, Brig. Gen. Daniel H. Hastings, adjutant general Pennsylvania. All organizations desiring to participate in the parade will notify the headquarters on or before Feb. 20, 1889, in order that they may receive proper assignment in the procession. No civic organization will be permitted in line numbering less than fifty men. No organizations wearing improper costume or equipment will be a place in the parade."

Petty Criminalities.

James Thomas, alias William Brennan, who was arrested at St. Louis for writing threatening letters to fallen women signing himself "Jack the Ripper," was committed to the insane asylum. When arrested he frankly confessed that he had come to St. Louis for the purpose of killing women on Poplar street and Clark avenue, a notorious quarter of the city.

Anthony Comstock had Gustav Yunker, a saloonkeeper, and his bartender fined $1 each for conducting a raffle. Yunker was selling chances in a picture lottery for the benefit of a widow with seven children when Mr. Comstock arrested him. The judge told Mr. Comstock that similar cases would be dismissed hereafter without a hearing. He said the law never contemplated such a prosecution.

A horse thief giving the name of Brown sold a team at Nebraska City, Neb., a few days ago and next day returned to Kansas, where he stole the first team, and stole nine head of horses more and shipped them to Omaha, where he was captured and identified by his Nebraska City victim. He will be taken to Kansas, where it is reported a mob awaits him and will undoubtedly be lynched. He is a member of an organized band operating in Kansas and Nebraska.

Miss Harriet Coffin, who was arrested in New York for annoying Kyrle Bellew, the actor, with whom she appears to be infatuated, was arraigned in court, and committed for examination as to her mental condition. She was very indignant because she had been locked up with a number of dissipated women for some time before her arraignment. She denied having given the actor any annoyance, and claimed that she was only waiting at the theater entrance for a stage.

The police here have captured a gang of robbers and assassins. Among the members of the gang is a man who is believed to have perpetrated the recent revolting murders of a number of women in the Whitechapel district of London. The British consul has forwarded to his government all the details connected with the arrests. The supposed Whitechapel murderer is charged with having committed in Tunis a murder similar to those committed in Whitechapel. The man has confessed that he recently lived in Whitechapel.

Charles Austin, for twenty years bookkeeper for Russey & McLeod, Troy, New York stove foundrymen, is missing; so is $10,000 or more of the firm's money. Austin left the city about two weeks ago, but the fact was not made public until recently. He was prominent in Masonic circles, and was implicitly trusted by his employers. He has had complete control of the firm's books for years. After leaving Troy he mailed a letter to his employers, in which he admitted that he had taken at least $10,000.

Developments in the failure of C. W. Seefield of St. Charles are slow, and what turns up do not make the condition of affairs any better. Representatives of several of the big commission houses that are losers by the collapse have arrived, accompanied by their attorneys; while a number of other creditors have wired Winona law firms to represent them in the muddle. Seefield's whereabouts are still unknown. The safe in his general office is locked with the books all inside. So far as definite estimates go, matters are practically in the same bewildered status. A St. Charles business man, who knows something of Seefield's business, thinks the liabilities will reach at least $300,000, and all available facts do not indicate a less figure.

At Myron Davis' house in the town of the Riga, N. Y. twelve miles from Rochester, Mrs. Mary J. Hale, a lady sixty years old was killed by Christ Berger, or Stickenberger, aged eighteen. The murderer killed his victim with a boot, pounding her face to a pulp, breaking the frontal bones and crushing the nose and forehead. Myron Davis' wife and two children left the house to attend a school entertainment. There were left in the house Mrs. Hill, two of Davis' children and Berger. It was found that the drawers of a bureau in the room where the murder was committed, had been ransacked. A silver watch, a revolver loaded, a half dollar of the coinage of 1812, which was a keepsake in the family, and a bunch of keys were missing.

The trial of Frederick Baldwin, who was accused of the murder of Edwin L. Miller, a divinity student, whose body was found at Westfield N. J. on July 15, ended in a verdict of acquittal. The jury without leaving their seats, immediately at the finish of the judge's charge, which was favorable to the prisoner, gave their verdict. A dramatic scene took place. Baldwin fell on his knees in prayer and thanksgiving while the crowd cheered the verdict. Baldwin and his family were escorted throughout the streets of the city by hundreds of people. Baldwin passing John Keron, the state detective, said, "I forgive you for the wrong you have done me and my family." The case against Baldwin was based on the fact that a satchel left with Baldwin by Miller was destroyed by Baldwin after the discovery of the body.

Since the extradition of De Baun, the defaulting cashier of the Park hotel, the following facts have come to light: After De Baun's flight the officers undertook to straighten out the books. They could not understand the accounts at all, and De Baun was communicated with. He was told that he would be allowed to come to New York if he would aid in untangling the books. De Baun came to the city and set to work on the books. As he proceeded to disclose his villainies the officers stood aghast. Robbery after robbery was revealed until at last the full sum of the defalcation was for the first time known. The explanation took some hours, and at its close De Baun and the friends whom he had defrauded repaired to a restaurant and had a sumptuous repast. The De Baun dropped in at his club, and early the next morning took an early train and returned to Canada.

Last September two bunco men swindled John K. Lemon of Allegheny, Pa., out of $10,000. One of them was finally located in Windsor, where he was registered at the British American as C. W. Goodyear. He is now in jail, awaiting examination for bringing stolen money into Canada. Goodyear's real name is said to be Frank A. Aldrich, and the detective says he has half a dozen aliases. He is known as one of the most adroit swindlers and has a criminal record in almost every state in the Union. Mr. Pinkerton says that Aldrich recently buncoed John Doane of Cleveland out of $1,800 and two Pennsylvania men out of $19,000. Aldrich has engaged a Windsor lawyer to defend him and claims to be innocent of the Lemon job, although admitting that there are people in the states who would like to see him very much. Lemon was ruined by the swindle.

Gen. H. K. McConnell was shot by Hon. James McManes in Osage City, Kan., McManes returned unexpectedly to his residence and saw McConnell suddenly taking his departure. Believing that McConnell had been guilty of improper relations with his wife, he opened fire at him with a pistol. McConnell received a bullet in his back and another in his hip. McManes gave himself up, making the statement that McConnell had caused the separation of himself and wife and had ruined the lives of both of them. McConnell is still alive, but physicians say that his wounds will in all probability prove fatal and think he cannot live through the night. He is one of the prominent attorneys of the state. The reports of his improper relations with the woman have been current for some time in Osage City. McConnell was a brigadier general in the army of the Potomac and was prominent in G. A. R. circles of the state. He was well known throughout Kansas, being an influential politician and one of the ablest attorneys of the state.

Foreign Gleanings

Sheriff Jeffries of Helena, Mont., arrived in Winnipeg from Regina with George Godin, the Montana murderer. He paid the officials of Regina $600 reward and all expenses. Jeffries says the general opinion in Helena is that Godin will not hang, but get a life sentence, if the supreme court grants a new trail. Goden protests his innocence of the crime for which he was sentenced to death. He states that he was in jail nine months awaiting trial, and with the attorney assigned him he only had ten minutes' interview just as the trial was beginning. He stated that Jack Swan, his jealous enemy, was his principal accuser, and he and his relatives, half-breeds, gave the convicting evidence. He says he was not furnished counsel to prepare his defense and get witnesses. He was there among strangers and no one took any interest in him, and he realized that being a subject of Canada was not in his favor there. He attributes his conviction to the American half-breeds, who could not traffic with him with profit. Sheriff Jeffries leaves for Helena with his prisoner.

Other News Jottings.

Owing to the continued mild weather the ice and snow have almost completely disappeared. The river is completely free of ice. The thermometer indicated 50. A year ago it registered 30 below zero. The ice palace which is in course of erection met with a serious set-back. Half of the western wall has collapsed.

The executive committee of the Iowa A. O. U. W.; known as the seceders, failed after a prolonged session to take any definite action toward bridging the chasm between them and the loyalists. They postponed action until their next meeting which follows the meeting of the grand lodge of the latter body. It is understood the seceders will accept but not make any overtures.

The grain growers and shippers of the board of trade have decided to make war on the Car Service association, which was recently organized by the Chicago railroads for the purpose of compelling shippers to pay demurrage on cars detained over forty-eight hours after arrival. The grain men will try to prove that the charges are illegal. The matter has been referred to the attorney of the board of trade, and a meeting of the Grain Receivers' association will be held to hear his report.

In the town of Sun River, Mont., a petition is being circulated asking the president, secretary of war and congress to abolish the military post at Fort Shaw and throw open for settlement the reservation, which comprised forty thousand acres of productive land. The petition represents the post is no longer needed at Fort Shaw, and suggests that it be transferred to some place nearer the Indian reservation, which is now fifty miles north of it. Some people consider that it would be better to reduce the reservation to about 1,000 acres, rather than abolish the post altogether.

The coal miners of Spring Valley, Ill., who have been in the employ of the Spring Valley Coal company held a mass meeting in the opera house and by a unanimous vote decided to quit work as long as one Thomas Mulvey works in the mines. This throws about eighteen hundred men out of employment. Two shafts remained at work, and the men in these shafts agreed to share their work with the idle men, the idle men to draw lots to determine which mine they want. One Mulvey, who had been transferred to one of the mines remaining at work about the time of the shutting down of the two mines refused to give up his work and draw lots with the rest of the men, or quit work. The miners applied to Manager Devin to discharge Mulvey, but he refused to do so. A mass meeting of miners was called, at which they resolved not to work him in the mines. Both the manager and the miners are determined not to give in. The strike may last a few days or six months.

St. Paul Fires.

The St. Paul Grand Opera House was destroyed by fire at an early hour on Monday morning the 21st. Sixteen streams of water were poured in upon the burning mass, and seven chemical engines discharged their contents in the same direction, but the fire gained steadily. The crackling of the fire as it licked up the rich tapestry hangings, fed upon the scenic effects and pirouetted from one dry timber to another could be plainly heard by the great crowd that gathered to watch the ruin long before the first red flame burst through the roof. From every crack and crevice, wherever an opening had been made by the firemen to admit the hose pipes, great billows of black smoke rushed out and, gathering in the damp morning air, completely enveloped the scene in a shroud of darkness.

It was 8:20 when the fire crept out at the top of the wall on the Fourth street side. Then one of the timbers supporting the roof fell, and a volcanic eruption of sparks and cinders broke out and lit up the smoky background. It was hot work for the firemen then. The whole in the roof created a draft which whirled the raging flames into a pillar that mounted higher and higher until the tip of it reached beyond the top of the tall smoke stack, that was Comodore Davidson's pride. No further attempt was made to save the opera house, the fireman directing their attention to preventing the fire from spreading to the nine-story Grand block, which adjoins the play house on the Wabasha street side, and the seven-story Court block adjoining on Fourth street.

The heavy iron doors which separate the main hall of the Court block from the opera house stage were at a white heat, and the wood work ignited. The occupants had become alarmed and began to remove their effects. A canvas slide stretched from the third floor to the street aided materially, and down this incline the valuable law libraries of a dozen attorneys found their way in safety.

The firemen fought hard. They battered down the molten iron doors, and turned three streams on the interior of the burning stage, stopping the progress of the fire in that direction. From the sixth story another company quenched the flames that caught in the window casements.

The frightened tenants in the Grand block were moving out, too, assisted by volunteers from the crowd. When the fire burned through the roof of the auditorium the flames spread to the rear windows in the upper stories of this block and spread rapidly through the numerous small rooms of the block, which was originally designed for a hotel. The fireman were on hand, however, and, before any considerable damage was done, had checked the fire there.

The opera house was insured for $60,000. Just what the loss, is, Mr. Ed Davidson, who represents the Davidson estate owning the property, is not willing to state. It is probable, however, that $100,000 would replace it as good as ever. When the late Commodore Davidson rebuilt the house in 1883 he said it cost him $60,000. Since then $20,000 has been expended in new decorations. The walls of the house are still standing intact, but it is doubtful if they can be utilized should it be again rebuilt.

ANOTHER COSTLY BLAZE.

Barisford's bakery and confectionery establishment was partially destroyed by fire on Tuesday morning, 22d inst. Loss about $50,000—insured.

Terrible Fight With Rats.

Owing to the heavy rains at Ellenville, N. Y., water rats have been driven to seek refuge in outhouses, barns or wherever they could find shelter from the pelting rain and resistless torrents. A great regiment of hungry looking rodents that make their homes along the banks of the Delaware & Hudson canal sought refuge one day recently in an outhouse adjoining the premises of a man named Simpson, who resides north of here on a knoll close by where a landslide occurred sometime ago. Becoming hungry, the rats left the outhouse and boldly invading the dwelling, attacked a babe that was lying asleep in the cradle. The mother rushed to the infant and tried to drive off the ferocious rats, when they at once fiercely attacked her. The woman's screams attracted the attention of Charles Jones, who has charge of the mail and express coach running between here and Kingston. Seizing his whip, Jones dashed into the house, and a horrible sight met his gaze. Hundreds of hungry rats with gleaming eyes were jumping wildly at a woman, who held a bleeding infant aloft in one arm, while with the other she tried ineffectually to "broom" the sharp-fanged rodents that were climbing over her garments to get at the child. "It was a blood-curdling sight," Jones says, "and one which I shall never forget. I snapped my whip at the rats, but not until a great dish of hot ashes and coals was thrown over them did they pretend to beat a retreat. I made good use of my whip, watching meanwhile to see that nothing was in danger of igniting from the coals that were scattered so lavishly about. One gray veteran returned over and over again to the charge, but I finally gave him such a cut with my whip that he, too, disappeared to return no more." Both mother and babe were severely bitten and scratched. The wounds bled profusely, but no seriously results have followed thus far.

Fatal Railroad Collision.

Passenger Train No. 8, bound for New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio railroad, while running fifty miles an hour this morning, struck a freight train, head end, near Tallmage, Ohio. Both engineers, both firemen and eight passengers were killed and fourteen passengers badly injured. The front end of the freight was put on the side track, and a flagman was left at Tallmage to flag Passenger Train No. 8, east-bound, then nearly due. The flagman imagined he heard a whistled signal from his engine to return to the train and did not perform the duty required of him. The engines came together with fatal results to eight persons and injuries to fourteen. Those reported killed are; Engineer Huntington, Fireman Walters, Brakeman Bashford, Express Messenger Landy, Mary Lyon, a little six-years-old girl of Cherry Tree, N. Y., and three Chinamen. As soon as the injured and dead were removed from the second coach, which was also on fire, the two sleepers were detached and pushed back by hand out of reach of the flames. None of the passengers in the sleepers were injured and all the persons who escaped death were placed in the sleepers and an extra engine conveyed them to a side track, where the next east-bound train coupled to them and proceeded to Leavittsburg. The injured: David Thomas of Galion, baggagemaster, badly injured, at first reported killed; Robert Owen of Kent, newsboy, one shoulder dislocated and bad cuts and bruises; Sam Douglas, engineer, of Galion, leg and head cut and bruised, burned about the abdomen; traveling in passenger coach, James Boyd of Paterson, N. J., severely hurt on head and back; George Shaw of Galion, freight brakeman, cut and bruised; Thomas Fairfax (colored) of Cleveland, leg broken in two places below the knee and bad cuts on head. Other passengers whose names were not learned received slight injuries, but some of them are serious. Those in the two sleepers escaped practically unhurt.

An Original Canadian Duel.

Near Louiseville, Que., two young men named Charpentier and Freichette, were aspirants for the hand of one Mlle. Chimene, and they were not long in finding a pretext for a quarrel which came to a tragic ending. They met and in the most cold-blooded manner arranged between themselves to settle the matter by a duel, the conditions of which were unique and barbarous. Seconds were dispensed with and both men were to go to a certain point on the river bank, at a given hour, and there fight with any weapon which came to hand, firearms or cutting weapons to be excluded, until one of them was killed or insensible, when the survivor was to throw his body into the river. Both men kept the appointment, and the battle lasted ten minutes, both men using their fists at first, after which they took to stones, and the end come when Charpentier's skull was crushed in by a blow from an iron bar which Freichette picked up. The final condition of throwing the body into the river was not complied with, the victor driving off in his wagon. He has escaped to the United States. It was impossible to cut off his flight, as the telegraph wires were rendered useless by the storm. Charpentier was found insensible, and the doctors say he cannot live. Mlle. Chimene, the cause of the quarrel, has been out of her mind since the tragic affair happened.

The Sackville Case.

A blue book on the Sackville affair has just been published in London. Interest in the book centers in a dispatch dated Oct. 24 to Mr. Phelps in which, observing that in the judgment of the government Lord Sackville's conduct has ceased to be of importance, President Cleveland, having already sent him his passports, Lord Salisbury controverts the idea that the acceptance of retention of a minister is a question to be determined solely with or without the reasons assigned by the government to which he is accredited. In this matter, Lord Salisbury says, general principles are of more importance than the particular case under discussion. These principles appear to the queen's government to have been accurately laid down by Lord Palmerston on the occasion of the sudden dismissal of Minister Bulwer from the court of Madrid in 1848. A quotation follows from Palmerston's communication to Isturiz, to the effect that international law entitles the nation to which a demand for the withdrawal of its minister has been addressed to decline to comply with the demand, even though grave and weighty reasons have been assigned. The Post, commenting on the subject, says: Lord Salisbury acted with due regard for national dignity. Lord Sackville's indiscretion does not condone Mr. Bayard's neglect of a decent international observance.

Bought up by "Bizzy."

The report circulated some time ago that Prince Bismarck had attempted to subsidize the St. James Gazette in the interest of Germany is virtually confirmed by a letter written by Mr. Greenwood, late principal editor of that journal. Mr. Greenwood states that he resigned his position on and all connection with the paper because the policy proposed to be pursued in its columns with regard to Germany was entirely incompatible with independence. He further admits that other attempts were made to get control of the paper with a view to using its columns for the benefit of Germany, though he does not give the persons making the attempts, and boldly challenges refutation of his statement. Mr. Steinknopf, the new owner of the St. James Gazette, denies Mr. Greenwood's version of the circumstances leading to his resignation, and declares that he has no knowledge of any attempt, or even desire, on the part of anybody to change the policy of the paper to suit the views of the German government.

The secretary of the interior has sent to congress a request for an appropriation of $3,000 for the purchase of twelve good stallions for the use of the Northern Cheyennes in horse breeding. Agent Upshaw states that these Indians now have 932 horses, mostly mares of a wiry and hardy breed which, if properly crossed, would make good saddle horses. The secretary has also sent to congress a communication from Agent Cromsie, of the Devils Lake reservation, asking an appropriation of $5,939 for the purchase of seed wheat, potatoes and rutabagas for the Indians at the Turtle Mountain reservation. The agent says that the nearest place where seed can be purchased is at Devils Lake, about eighty miles from the reservation, and that this makes the seed to be bought expensive.

The supreme court heard argument in the habeas corpus proceedings by which John W Keely, the inventor, was released from the county prison last November, after having been committed by Judge Finletter for alleged contempt of court in not obeying the order to exhibit and explain his motor to experts appointed by the court at the request of counsel for Bennett C. Wilson, in an injunction suit against Keely. Wayne MacVeigh, of counsel for Keely, in his argument criticized Judge Finletter's judicial conduct in the case with most unsparing severity. The matter was held under advisement.

DAKOTA'S PLEA.

The Statehood Convention Held at Huron Asks for Division and Admission.

The convention was called to order by Judge Campbell of Yankton chairman of the committee calling it. On taking the chair Gen. Campbell said:

There is at the present session of congress a disposition to pass some bill for the admission of Dakota. If a bill is passed it must be done by compromise with both parties. Many in South Dakota are sensible of the fact that unless this congress does act there is danger that they will have to wait for another congress to act. There will be a delay of two or three years, and in view of that danger the committee thought it best to call a convention to express their wishes on that point, and what should be done by congress, and other matters they might see proper to take up. The call was made at the request of persons outside of the committee and of the committee unanimously. It was learned that the next thirty would be a critical time in Washington, and as there are no new representatives of statehood in South Dakota, while there are fresh members of the Democratic party there, sent from Mitchell, and delegates from North Dakota, It was thought well to call a convention to see what action should be taken with regard to friends in Washington on this subject. This is the motive of the call.

Rev. H. D. Dresser of Huron offered prayer, when Maj. A. G. Kellem of Chamberlain was made temporary chairman. R. W. Wheelock of Mitchell was made temporary secretary. The chair appointed these committees:

Credentials—Bennett of Clark, Wright of Lake, Walsh of Charles Mix, Wade of Deuel, Foster of Douglas.

Resolutions—Hole of Beedle, Preston of Davison, Pease of Codington, Gamble of Yankton, Cadwell of Brown, McManimas of Hughes, Palmer of Minnehaha, Murphy of Brookings, Thorson of Lincoln.

Organization—Adams of Day, Fellows of Aurora, Dool of Hanson, Humphrey of Faulk, Kanouse of Sanborn.

Temporary organization made permanent. The report of the credentials committee was presented and adopted. Fully two-thirds of the counties are represented. Adjourned till 7:30.

MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

On the reassembling of the convention the following report of the committee on resolutions was presented and adopted without a dissenting voice and amid great cheering.

Whereas, The people of the Territory of Dakota, both north and south, in their recent conventions assembled here declared themselves in favor of admission thereof on the seventh standard parallel and of immediate admission into the Union of both North and South Dakota; and

Whereas, The people of Dakota south of the seventh standard parallel again desire to show such expression favorable to the immediate admission of South Dakota, therefore

Resolved, That we, the people of South Dakota, irrespective of party politics, in delegate convention assembled, most respectfully and earnestly petition the present session of congress to take such measures as will immediately admit us into the union as a state.

Resolved, That in the event South Dakota is not admitted at the present session of congress were respectfully petition the president that he call a special session thereof immediately after the fourth of March next, and with full faith and confidence in such administration we submit that such an extra session make provision for our immediate admission as to congress may seem just and proper.

Resolved, That in the event this session of congress makes no provision for admission, and in further event that an extra session of congress is called, we request our present legislature to provide for a new constitutional convention for South Dakota.

A copy of the resolution was ordered engrossed and sent to President-elect Harrison, president of the senate, speaker of the house, Delegate Gifford, George A. Mathews and the president and speaker of both houses of the territorial legislature. The following statehood committee of South Dakota was appointed by legislative districts:

First district, John M. Zeller; Second, J. R. Gamble; Third, F. Lecoq; Fourth, B. F. Campbell; Fifth, T. E. F. Mentzer; Sixth, George L. Wright; Seventh, George W. Hopp; Eighth, John Cain; Ninth, A. E. Carpenter; Tenth, J. H. Baldwin; Eleventh, J. C. McManima; Twelfth, H. R. Pease; Thirteenth, Ed Lowe; Fourteenth, Edwin Vancice.

The statehood committee met and elected Maj. A. G. Kellum of Chamberlain chairman at large. A committeeman from each county was also chosen to act auxiliary to the statehood committee. The convention then adjourned.

A dynamite cartridge was exploded in the house of the largest weaver in Bacelona. The house was completely wrecked. The only person injured was a servant, whose leg was shattered. The outrage is connected with the series of similar crimes recently committed in Madrid. Several persons have been arrested here on suspicion, and documents found in their possession have given the police a clue to the perpetrators of the outrages.

Chairman Abbott has called a meeting of the general managers of the lines in the Western States Passenger Association. The object is to take action on the proposed new passenger agreement.

GERMANY HOSTILE.

Americans Stabbed at Samoa and Houses of an Ex-Consul Burned.

APIA, Samoa, Jan. 19.—The most serious state of affairs exists in Samoa. On the night of Dec. 18 the sailors of the German men-of-war Adler, Olga and Eber attacked Mataafa's soldiers, under the direction of the German consul and Capt. Fritz, the senior naval officer in the port. As the result of the encounter twenty-two German sailors were killed, and thirty-two wounded. Since then the German war ships have burned American houses and flags, torn down the United States flag, seized American citizens in the neutral waters of Apia harbor and taken them prisoners on board of the German men-of-war and fired upon the American flag. King Mataafa's party, who had been fighting almost constantly since the battle at Lautoanua, killing and wounding many of Tamasese's men, began to fail of ammunition, but were able to obtain 20,000 Snider cartridges, mortgaging their lands to pay for ammunition. Tamasese's men were reported becoming more dissatisfied daily, and desertions from his ranks became very frequent, several villagers leaving his party in a body and going to their homes. A detachment of succeeded in carrying the upper end of Tamasese's big fort, Lantuando, on Dec. 12. On the same day the German man-of-war Olga arrived from Marshall Islands. The boat had on board the departed King Malleton, whom the Germans had decided to bring back from Africa where he had been taken. Malleton had been left at Marshall Islands, not having been brought back to Samoa. On the night of Dec. 16, a large party of German sailors numbering one hundred and eighty came ashore at Apia and entered the stores, saloons and native houses in search of Americans, Englishmen and half-castes. They entered the residence of George Scanlan, United States marshal in Apia. He was not in, but the sailors found him, his brother and Morris Snyder, also an American citizen, further up the street, and starting a quarrel, stabbed the Americans in the back. The Scanlans escaped to a native church where their wounds were dressed and found not to be fatal. The German sailors ran through the streets attacking all persons they met except Germans, and injured the adherents of Tamasese, and among the number were native women and children.

GERMAN BOATS ATTACKED.

On Dec. 17 the United States consul sent a protest to the German consul, asserting that the conduct of the Germans had been outrageous, and had placed the Americans' lives and property in great jeopardy. At 7 o'clock on the morning of Dec. 17 the Olga left Apia and steamed up the coast, and returned that evening with Tamasese's secretary on board. That night the secretary wrote a letter to his wife in Apia, stating that the Germans would attack the town named Matafagatele during the night, and would attack Mataafa's men while they were sleeping. This town is situated about two miles above Apia. The woman told the news to one of her relatives in Apia, who in turn sent word to Mataafa's soldiers. Before midnight 200 armed men and assembled on shore a short distance above the English consulate, and concealing themselves in the bush waited for the appearance of the German boats, which, it was said, would contain a number of Tamasese men as well as German sailors who had been brought from Saluafata by the Olga. An American newspaper man named John C. Klein accompanied the Mataafa men to witness the proceedings in the interest of his paper. About 2 o'clock in the morning three German men-of-war boats approached about half a mile above the British consulate and were distinctly seen by

THE BRITISH CONSUL.

It was evident that their intention was to land and proceed to Matafagatele on foot. The soldiers of Mataafa gathered on the shore and asked Klein to ask the Germans not to land, as it would be regarded as a hostile act, and that they would be fired upon. This was shouted to them when the boats were fifty yards from the shore. The boats came on toward the shore, and when they received a second warning two boats then pulled out towards the sea and went to a village called Vallele, four miles from Apia. A third boat kept along the coast, being still followed by Mataafa's soldiers. When opposite Matafagatele the boat pulled straight across the bay to a point on the other extremity. A Mataafa chief, followed by eight or nine men, ran around the edge of the bay to intercept the boat. When opposite the village of Fagali the boat pulled rapidly for the shore. At the same moment three men on horseback, carrying lanterns, rode out of the bush and signaled the men in the boats. Simultaneously a number of German soldiers rose from the bottom of the boat, where they had been concealed, and began to wade ashore. Some of Mataafa's men had come up in the meantime, and the Germans began shooting at them. The natives did not return the fire. The Germans were soon landed and took shelter behind some rising ground.

THEY OPEN FIRE.

As soon as they gained this position they at once opened fire on Mataafa's men. Within a minute fully two hundred shots had been fire by the Germans and black laborers, natives and other islanders, who work on the German plantations. In the meantime Mataafa's reinforcements began to arrive from Matafagatele, and as they came up heavy volley fired could be heard from the direction of Vallele, and in a few minutes a chief arrived and said the Germans were firing on Matafaa's men there, who were afraid to return the fire; although the Germans had already killed Savay, chief, and his son. The chief who came as messenger asked Klein if they would be justified in returning the fire of the Germans, but he declined to advise them, but requested of a high chief who accompanied the latter to Apia to obtain the opinion of the United States vice consul, but the consul also refused to give any advice. Shortly afterwards the natives came into Apia from Fagali and Vallele saying that the Mataafa men had driven the German sailors from the breastworks. Black laborers had run into the bush and refused to fight longer. The Germans had run along the beach to Vallele at such a rapid rate that could not overtake them. At Vallele there were about one hundred and fifty soldiers, one boat load having been landed there during the night by the German man-of-war Eber. At Vallele sailors who had fled from Fagali joined their comrades who had left in the two other boats and also the sailors from the Eber. They formed a hollow square and commenced shooting at Mataafa's men. Soon after two of the latter had been killed they began to return the fire. The native soldiers began to increase in number, attracted by the firing, and shot from behind trees and from bushes. The sailors became panic stricken, despite the efforts of their three

WORSE AND MORE OF IT.

On the 21st a boat from the German man-of-war Olga was chasing a native boat in neutral waters opposite the American consulate. The Germans fired a number of shots at the boat, which was in direct range of the boat containing two English officers, the latter of whom narrowly escaped being shot. The commander of the Olga afterward apologized to the English officers. Charles Brown, an American citizen who was on the shore, was requested by the English officers to ask the Germans to cease shooting. The Germans seized Brown, carried him on board of the war ship Eber, and after handling him roughly released him. The Germans have made further assaults upon the villages since the bombardment of Matafagatele United States Consul Blacklock has telegraphed all the facts respecting the situation here, informing Secretary Bayard that the American flag had been shot and torn down and burned by the Germans; that American citizens have been taken prisoners by the Germans, and states that the lives and property of American citizens are in great danger.

BAYARD IS COMPLACENT.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—A copy of the dispatch from Apia to-day, in regard to insults to Americans and the American flag at Samoa by German soldiers, was shown to Secretary Bayard this evening. He said the disturbance referred to was undoubtedly the same as that briefly described by Consul Blacklock in his cable message to the department on the 5th inst. The consul's account, he said, was not near so sensational as the one just received from San Francisco, but contained later information, however, as it told that the Americans who were seized had been released immediately afterward. The secretary added that the department is in constant communication with Samoa, through its agents, one of whom is stationed at Auckland, and the latest information received is to the effect that affairs are quiet in that country, and that no serious trouble has occured since the 5th inst.

THE LATEST.

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 20.—The details of the affair at Samoa, which followed the attempt of the Germans to land their forces and the defeat of their troops, described at length in the associated press correspondence from Apia telegraphed last night, are supplemented by other correspondents whose whose accounts are published here. The Samoan Times, published at Apia, and which has been impartial in its accounts of the events on the islands, gives the following version of the fight of Dec. 18: At 2 o'clock on the morning of Tuesday eighty sailors from the Olga were landed at Mataafa, and forty more were sent in boats along the coast, the eighty men marching on land to meet Mataafa. At a German farmer's plantation the shore party were reinforced by all the imported labor, said to be New Britain men, so that Mataafa was between the 200 men who came down the day before and the German sailors and foreign laborers. Mataafa, knowing the danger of interference with the German soldiers, retired inland a few hundred yards. The Germans followed up and killing a young man, son of the chief. The chief, getting terribly excited, was only prevented by his own people from firing into the Germans, but while struggling against former efforts he himself was shot and fell dead beside his son. Mataafa's people could not stand this, and by common impulse, without orders, returned the fire. Their first volley killed six Germans and wounded others. Several of Tamasese's men fled, and the laborers refused to fight it out, knowing that this meant certain death. The sailors beat a hasty retreat to their boats. Mataafa's warriors followed them some distance. Mataafa lost about ten killed and wounded, while the German loss is stated at twenty killed. Among the dead is Lieut. Sieger. The United States steamer Nipsic steamed to Saluafata on Tuesday on hearing that the German war ships were going to shell Mataafa's stronghold. Capt. Mullan had communications with the German commanders, and entered his protest against their reported project. His protest was not taken notice of, however, for the Olga threw shells into the spot where Mataafa was supposed to be, but which he had vacated.

THE GERMANS TO BLAME.

The current testimony of the action of the Germans shows that the Germans brought upon themselves the fate that overtook them, as it was not until two of Mataafa's chiefs were killed that he ordered his men to fire on the Germans. The marines were only saved from extermination by the prompt arrival of their gunboats. After their defeat the Germans bombarded the village of Matafagatele, although warned by American Consul Blacklock that three houses in the place belonged to an American citizen. Over these houses an American flag floated, yet the flag was torn down and partially burned by the German sailors, who landed to complete the destruction of the place. Correspondents also give accounts of insult to an American in the neutral district of Apia. Mataafa has threatened that if the Germans again attack his men he will destroy all the German property on the islands.

The Fountain of Youth.

What joy may come to a married pair, even with the first dawning of a new life, if only their hearts are attuned to mutual interest, mutual affection, mutual aspiration. The orange blossom is made the symbol of married love for no other reason that I know of but because it puts forth its stainless petals anew for each new fruit. So in married life the setting of each new germ should be attended with a new flowering of the first love—the love of youth. "A little of the old love" was the message with which a husband I once knew always closed his letters to his wife. A little of that same old love made new and fresh for the occasion ought to accompany the wife through every stage of every maternal experience. The thoughtful attentions, the tender endearments of the wooing time, should be renewed, and they will have a deeper meaning and serve a grand purpose than was possible to them before, for loving children are not born into unloving homes. The wife, too, who is thus tenderly cared for will keep her pristine charms of soul if not of body. Her youthfulness will be renewed by a perpetual miracle, for that dear "old love" is the true and only fountain of perpetual youth, and it is the privilege of married lovers to bathe in it at will. Confidence.

In the early days of Antrim, N. H., Deacon Aiken and William Smith were great friends, and the historian of the town narrates this instance of their mutual confidence:

Deacon Aiken bought a yoke of oxen of Mr. Smith, and not having the money in hand just then, wrote his note for the amount.

"Well, now," said Mr. Smith, "I haven't any desk to keep this in. Why won't you keep it till I call for it?"

So Deacon Aiken kept the note till he was ready to pay it. Then he delivered it up, at the same time paying it in full, and Mr. Smith took the note!—Youth's Companion.

The Commercial and National hotels and the Marshall house of Brainerd, Minn., were burglarized, the thieves getting about $100 in money, a gold watch, a $40 suit of clothes and other valuable articles. At the Commercial the room of Chief of Police Coffery was entered while he was asleep and $40 in money and his watch and revolver taken. The burglar is supposed to be a man who came in on a late train and registered at the Commercial as J. L. Scott of Helena, Mont., but had flown when search was made for him.

Who Didn't Happen to Think that he W. D. Washburn, Was the Best Man for U. S. Senator.

The Distinguished Gentleman relieves his Mind and May Recover.

We must confess to a feeling of disappointment in the estimate of the character of Mr. Washburn that we have had ever since we first met him, if the following article, purporting to be an interview between a Tribune reporter and Mr. Washburn is a correct report. We had always considered him an honorable gentleman in every particular, one incapable of using such language to or against any political opponent. This is what the Tribune says:

"Mr. Washburn, propped up on pillows, acknowledged, between sips of beef tea, to a Tribune representative that the fight had been a severe one."

"Into every other political contest I entered," he said, "I have done so with Hennepin County solid behind me. If this time I had had the support of the men who were elected by my friends and are my friends the result would have been attained much more easily. There is nothing so calculated to take courage out of a fellow as a fire in the rear, and the opposition though was small, powerful and unscrupulous. Their efforts made my triumph the sweeter. I am proud of the hostility of the three members from Hennepin and the small band on the outside.

And then they tried to smirch me. That was Satan rebuking sin, wasn't it? Sabin had not more than 18 votes when he went into the contest, and there was only one way he could get them. But as to the bribery charges, they never occasioned me a moment's anxiety. I could defy the most searching investigation. Outside of the members of the house and senate Sabin had scarcely a known and recognized republican to uphold him. His following was made up of the mercenary men of the party, political strumpets like Charley Gilman and others of the same caliber. I should have been prouder to be beaten with the men who aided me than to have won with that class of backing. St. Paul might have raised the sectional issue against me, but generously refrained from it."

Warren Register: The long and ardent contest over the senatorial nomination was settled in favor of Gen. Washburn, and he will be the next senator from Minnesota, taking the place of Senator Sabin. Some of our contemporories, who had so recently flopped from Washburn to Sabin, no doubt feel to say, "Since I am so soon done for, I wonder what I begun it for." THE POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, which was among the first to hoist Washburn's picture "to the fore" and also headed the aforesaid flop in the 45th district, will, we hope, be able to console itself with the reflection that it was on the winning side in the fight during a part of the contest, anyway. And we hope also, that Bro. Cooke will use that lively pen of his to administer comfort to those "leading and influential papers in their counties," that followed his lead; for a fellow feeling should "make us wondrous kind," you know.

We do not find any consolation in that direction, Bro. Stevens, but we do in the fact that the election of Hon. D. M. Sabin would have been the best thing for the interest of this country. The editor has been acquainted with Gen. Washburn for a number of years and has esteemed him highly as a personal friend, and when he wrote us requesting us to publish a sketch of his life with his picture at the head we did it, just the same as we would do for any friend. At that time we had taken no active part in the canvass and did not intend to take an active part in it. For years, ever since the writer came to Crookston, in 1878, the people of this city and country down as far as St. Vincent have been very desirous of obtaining an independent, direct line of road to Duluth, and have seemed willing to do anything and everything in their power to accomplish this end. It is well-known that recently that desire bids fair to be fully realized. The projectors of this enterprise, knowing that Mr. Sabin had helped them in the past felt confident of his ability and disposition to help them in the future, were very anxious that Mr. Sabin should succeed himself, the more especially as Washburn's Soo system is entirely antagonistic to our line to Duluth. Just as soon as we saw what Mr. Sabin's interest in our road is we saw, that if it is to the interest of this country to have this new road it was to her interest to aid the friends of the enterprise hence our duty became plain, as it is the duty of everybody loyal to our best interests. Bro. Stevens will please note the fact that our representatives coincided with us and did their best to elect Mr. Sabin. They knew that Mr. Sabin was in position to subserve our interests better than anyone else and therefore they stood by this country by standing by him. If anyone doubts these facts he will have his doubts removed in the near future as coming events will amply prove what we say. No portion of the state had so great a question of local interest involved in the success of Hon. D. M. Sabin as did this legislative district, and had we had our proper representation the result would have been his election. Or, could the question have been submitted to the people of the state by ballot we feel confident that Sabin would have been elected by a large majority. Why then, Bro. Stevens, should we regret our action? Knowing that it was right and that it is endorsed by our representatives and by the people they represent we feel proud of the little mite we contributed to aid in the emancipation of this country from the slavery it has so long endured, by striving to elect to the U. S. Senate a strong and steadfast friend of the road and the people, and our only regret is, that, after all, the people were defeated.

Senator Sabin.

The manner in which Senator Sabin took his defeat shows what manner of man he is and won him hosts of friends. For weeks the tongue of slander had uttered calumnious reports against him spreading all sorts of reports, among which, was one that "he was more than one-half democrat, and would not go into a republican caucus." Mr. Sabin was well aware that if he refused to go into a caucus his re-election was absolutely sure, but he proved himself a true blue republican by taking his chances with other republicans in a caucus. With all of the strength of the republican press of the twin cities against him he waged a manly warfare, never once breathing one word that would reflect against the honor of his opponents. He went into the caucus with the positive assurance of more than votes enough to nominate him and when the blow fell he proved his manhood and his republicanism by gracefully giving up the struggle and pledging his support to the successful aspirant. Even after the caucus, when some of his zealous friends went to him with stories of very peculiar tactics, hinting at the use of boodle and urging him to organize a bolt, Mr. Sabin stood firm and urged his followers to go slow in that matter, saying that if it was proved that money had been improperly used it would be sufficient cause to break the caucus role,

"BUT I SINCERELY HOPE IT IS UNTRUE!"

Did any one of the St. Paul papers give him credit for his manly action? To the utter shame of the republican sheets be it said that NO REPUBLICAN paper did, but they all united in trying to make it appear that Senator Sabin was organizing a bolt. Mr. Sabin's course during this affair has shown to the people of this state the noble manhood of the man who for six years has represented this people in the United States Senate so truly and faithfully, and gives him a proud position in the hearts of the people that money can not buy nor take away, a record far better than would have been a victory that did not reveal the intrinsic worth of the man and if any one has an idea that the name of D. M. Sabin will disappear from our state politics let him undeceive himself as quickly as possible, for he stands before the people to-day revealed in his true light more solid than ever before. As he is the friend of the common people so will they be his friends and he will live and flourish, honored and trusted long after the toadstools that sprung up at his defeat have withered and wasted into everlasting obscurity. There lives not in the State of Minnesota to-day a greater, nobler nor better man than the Hon. Dwight M. Sabin.

Senator C. B. Buckman covered himself all over with glory by the manner in which he conducted the senatorial campaign and especially by the manly stand he took after the caucus. This is what he said to a Pioneer Press reporter:

"I have never played the baby act, and I don't think I will in this case. I worked hard for Senator Sabin. I did everything I could to elect him, knowing that he was a friend of mine and that I would have a friend at Washington. Nothing ever hurt me more personally than his defeat, but we went into the caucus, and they got the sixty-two votes perhaps as much by chance as anything else. We were licked. I acknowledge it, and it seems to me to be the proper thing to stand by it. Two years ago when Gov. McGill was nominated the cry of boodle and wheat ring was raised by the friends of defeated aspirants. Last fall after the state convention the cry of boodle was again raised by those who had not won. The practice is pernicious and hurtful to the party. I am a republican. I have stood by every convention or caucus that I was ever in, and I don't think the time has come for me to go back on one now. I have done everything that was in my power for my friend, and, if the caucus had not settled it, I would have been for him still. If we had got the sixty-two votes I would have been demanding that every republican stand by it and unite the party. I do not expect anything from Mr. Washburn, as I opposed him with all the strength I had. Nor did I expect anything from Mr. Sabin. He was my friend and I fought for him. There is no need of saying that his defeat hurt me, for everybody knows that, but behind it all is the party to which we belong, and I would not bolt a nomination for myself and I cannot do it for my friend."

An Important Case.

THE LAND GRANT SUIT OF THE JIM HILL'S ROAD AGAINST THE DULUTH & WINNIPEG ON TRIAL.

Duluth Evening Herald.

Judge Stearn's court this morning was devoted to the case of the Brainerd & Northwestern road vs the Duluth & Winnipeg, a suit in which the plaintiff seeks to debar the defendant from securing title to certain valuable swamp lands granted by the state legislature. The case is one of unusual importance to Duluth and is of great interest. It is based on facts as follows: A number of years ago the state legislature granted to the Duluth & Winnipeg road a land grant of so called swamp lands, lands which revert to the state on survey by the general government, amounting to 10 sections per mile of road completed. This grant was to lapse in 1888. Later a small part of these lands were given the Duluth & Iron Range and have been accepted and selected by the latter. Two years ago the St. Paul Brainerd & Northwestern road, a creation of Jim Hill's came to the front and a request was made for the Duluth & Winnipeg grant should it lapse. This request was granted. Now the Duluth & Winnipeg has completed two ten miles sections of the road, and asks for two allotments of land. This the other road endeavors to stop. Hence the suit.

Its outcome will undoubtedly be favorable to the Duluth & Winnipeg, for it is held by the supreme cort that the act of giving to a second road land grants unearnd by a first is illegal, as the land reverts to the state, and it remains in the state with no further right to give. And it is a question whether, after a grant is once made, it can be forfeited. The case will be watched with great interest, as it is of a good deal more than local importance, besides being in the nature of a test case to settle law points now open and disputed. It will undoubtedly be carried up to the supreme court by whichever company comes out behind here.

Hartley Heard From

THE OUTSPOKEN DULUTHIAN TALKS OF THE SENATORIAL CONTEST.

Duluth Daily Tribune.

Hon. G. G. Hartley, of Duluth, has been one of Senator Sabin's warmest and most intimate supporters, says the Globe. He expressed himself, when questioned as to the charges of bribery in the defeat of Mr. Sabin, in the following terms:

"Senator Sabin is, in my opinion, one of the best representatives the state has had. In point of ability, social and business character, he has no superior in Minnesota. His big good heart has always been with the people. These qualifications, and his splendid social standing at Washington, have made him always willing and able to attend to the wants of his constituents, and he has been particularly careful of the interests of the rural districts. I believe he is nearer the hearts of the people than any of his competitors in this contest, and in my humble way I have done what was possible for him. I opposed Mr. Washburn to the best of my ability, and would do it again if the opportunity presented itself. Mr. Washburn's friends made a mistake in allowing their buzzards to attempt to spew filth on Senator Sabin's character through the columns of the great republican press of these two cities. Senator Sabin's friends made an open-handed, gallant fight, and have the nerve to accept defeat. The caucus was a representative republican caucus. Mr. Washburn carried it, and in my opinion no good friend of Senator Sabin will seek to smirch Mr. Washburn by accusing him of bribery or anything of the sort. That is not their fighting tactics, and if any such move is made it will not originate from Senator Sabin's friends."

One of the most delightful of Susan Coolidge's stories, "Who ate the Queen's Luncheon?" opens the February Wide Awake, with a beautiful frontispiece of Garrett. Another short story as singularly humorous, a valentine story, is entitled "The Apple of Discord," and will entertain all the grammar school boys and girls; it is by Georgiana Washington. "Princess Mayblossom" by Annette Lyster, with its eight pictures, is a dainty fairy story. "Children in Italian Sculpture," by Mabel F. Robinson, is a model art paper for young people, with interesting pictures. The serial stories by J. T. Trowbridge and Margaret Sidney are very popular for family reading—a genial happy home element pervades both; Phronsie's "dragons" are irresistible. "The Tupper Children" is a short story of the old war-days by Miss A. G. Plymton, full of dash and fun. "Forty-eight Hours a day" will interest all astronomically-minded young folk and their elders as well. "Nonsense Animals" is very amusing and affords a hint for home-fun of an evening. "An Old-Fashioned Boat" is an interesting chapter in the progress of invention, by Ernest Ingersoll. Mrs Sallie Joy White in her chapter on "The Use of the Oven" tells how potatoes are baked in the Boston public schools. Mrs. Goddard Orpen gives the history of the famous Spanish crown pearl, the Pelegrina. Prof. Starr, in his geological series, describes some of the gnawings of "The Tooth of Time." In the new department, "Men and Things," are all sorts of good original anecdotes and breezy "short talk." The poems of the number are many and good, the Ramona, Post Office, Puzzle and C. Y. F. R. U. sections very full and entertaining. Only $2.40 a year. D. Lothrop Company, Boston.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Devoted to the history of the war.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Devoted to the interests of ex-soldiers and sailors.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
That makes a bold and persistent fight for their rights.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
That continually insists on justice being done the country's defenders.

It Has More Distinguished Contributors than Any Other Paper.

A Splendid 8-Page, 56-Column Paper.

Printed on fine paper, edited with signal ability and filled with the most interesting matter that can be procured.

ONLY $1 A YEAR—TWO CENTS A WEEK.

The National Tribune is the result of years of earnest, thoughtful effort, accompanied by a heavy expenditure of money, to build up at the Capital of the country which should be a welcome weekly visitor at every fireside from the Atlantic to the Pacific and champion effectively the cause of loyalty and good government, and of justice to the soldiers and sailors of the late war, their widows, children and dependent relatives. How well this has been done is best indicated by the wonderful success of the paper, which has attained popularity and circulation more rapidly than any other in the history of American journalism.

Features of the Paper.

The National Tribune makes a special feature of the history and reminiscences of the war for the preservation of the Nation. It publishes in fact the

of that gigantic struggle, for its history is not a warped and biased panegyric of some particular man or men, who are given credit for everything that succeeded. It is made up of the testimony of a multitude of witnesses, the plain, unvarnished stories of the men in every rank and degree who did the marching, digging and shooting and carried forward the war through all its various phases to a glorious success. The great value of the National Tribune's history is everywhere recognized, and its files are carefully preserved in every large library and historical collection in the country—North or South.

A fascinating story by Col. Thos. Knox, the brilliant writer of popular books, is now running in the paper.

An entertaining historical romance, by Frances Wilson (Fannie Williams), now appearing, is exciting great interest among the young folks with whom Miss Wilson has always been a great favorite.

John McElroy, who has written so much and so acceptably for the soldiers, will soon begin another war story.

Besides this it presents every week a splendid array of Editorials on Current Topics Stories by the Best Authors—Wit, Humor and Information—Agricultural Notes of the Greatest Value—Household Hints and Suggestions—Synopsis of the News of the Week—Answers to Correspondents—Bright Miscellany, etc., which will interest, amuse and instruct every member of the family.

CROOKSTON

CREAMERY,

WALSH & BJOIN, Prop's.

The Crookston Creamery is now ready for business, and solicits the patronage of every progressive farmer. At the prices that we now pay, you can make more money out of your cream than you can to make it into butter yourself. It only needs a trial to convince you.

We invite the patronage of all who are interested in their own welfare, as well as that of the county to call and see us.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., JANUARY 31, 1889.

The Tendency.

Western Rural.

History marks the decline of communities as certainly as it speaks of their splendid development. In this country we are inimical to our own interests if we fail to study well the lessons of history and to recognize the fact that the tendency of human nature is downward and not upward. In affairs of government the natural tendency is not toward a high ideal but toward all that made the provocation for the rebellion of the colonies a hundred years ago. Man is supremely selfish. He loves money, he loves power, and he enjoys prominence, and these are all in the direction of opposition to the theories which underlie this Republic. We frequently give expression to feeling of alarm, in view of the rapid concentration of wealth in the hands of the few. We count up our increasing millionaires with well grounded anticipation of danger. Some of us are not pleased with the disposition of Congress to make a pensioned class, outside of those who have done service in the army. We view with regret the unlawful means that are adopted to place men in office and to keep them in office, for all these things are blows to the perpetuity of the Republic as it was founded and still practically exists. It is not difficult to observe that while in essential matters the principles of the Republic have not been disastrously disturbed there is a gradual letting down. An aristocracy is developing. It is a sort of shoddy article, but in feeling it is immense, and it is the feeling of the aristocrat, whether he is the simon-pure article or simply galvanized, that does the harm. The greed of men has led to the great absorption of wealth in the last few years; and the statement often made that our immense territory is all that has saved us from becoming an Ireland is probably true, and if true, it is a very serious fact to contemplate. If it is true then it is only a matter of time when the land of the United States will belong to a few, and the many will be tenants, and when the few will be lords and the many peasants and perhaps serfs, unless there is a radical reform.

Ventilation in Stables.

Hoard's Dairyman: The Dairyman in the years gone by, has had more or less to say about easy method of ventilating living rooms or naturally damp cellars by means of a pipe reaching almost to the floor of the room or the bottom of the cellar, and have the upper end of the pipe run into the stove pipe in an upper room, or into a chimney that has the heat and hot smoke from some fire constantly rarifying the air in the pipe or chimney so that there will be a draft in the ventilating pipe that will take off the cold air from the base.

This method of ventilation has now become standard, the fires it takes to keep warm in cold weather acting as the force to do the ventilating. In summer, when little or no fire is needed, the hot air is made to rise in the chimney, and thus the ventilating pipe operated, by placing a small fire in the chimney or a small kerosene stove, or a big lantern even will create the needed force or movement so that ventilation goes on.

This method of ventilation will operate as successfully to cleanse the foulness of a stable as the dampness of a cellar. A pipe reaching from the base of the cellar to the roof of the barn, and a big lantern placed in the pipe, say on the second floor of the barn, would take up the foul odors and damp air so that the stable of a basement barn would be kept sweet and wholesome; whereas they are now the very reverse, and some of them abominably so.

They have been voted so uncomfortable and unhealthy for stock, that many farmers have, of late years built their barns so that the stable were above the ground entirely. While we are not enamored of the cellar stable, we know there are thousands of them all over Wisconsin, and we point out a way that they can be made far more healthful for the cattle, especially milch cows; and at small expense.

Monopoly's Bold Effrontery.

The Prairie Farmer.

English monopolists evidently don't take much stock in the seriousness of the attempt of American legislation to grapple with trusts and other illegal capitalistic "combines." They lay the flattering unction to their greedy souls that the representatives of Uncle Sam's children are themselves too deeply in the monopolistic mire to offer any but a spasmodic or half-hearted opposition to the aggressions of trusts, syndicates and the like. There may be just a shade of possibility that English speculators are reckoning too much without their host—the body of the great American people—in this matter, but the opposition to their grasping schemes is at present so feeble, that they consider themselves entirely safe in the risk of their capital in such enterprises, for at least some time to come.

Based on such calculations the English Salt Trust is rapidly maturing its scheme for obtaining control of all the salt works in the world. The agent of the syndicate, who a short time since visited the United States and Canada to talk things over with the manufacturers, has reported to his chief that his mission was satisfactory, away beyond his expectations. This was so gratifying to the syndicate that they have now started their emissary out with a definite proposal, offering to buy the whole of the salt works on the American continent. According to the idea of the syndicate, the direction of the great salt industry will be consolidated, and offices established in New York. It is also under-stood that it is the intention to have one half the capital in England, and the remainder in the United States and Canada. Manufacturers, who sell out to the syndicate, are pledged, under contract, not to engage in manufacture on their own account for a period of ten years. They will be, however, allowed to invest one-third of the proceeds of their plant in stock of the trust. The trust, we are assured on the authority of a prominent English paper, guarantees its members a dividend at the rate of 25 per cent each year.

The trust is becoming quite cosmopolitan in its tastes and designs. Nothing small or circumscribed will suit the modern monopolist. The industries and products, the very necessities of the world at large, must be cornered and controlled, to gratify the avarice of monopoly. The last cent must be squeezed from the long-suffering people. Monopoly is even now bent on taxing the unfortunate traveling public. The fiat has gone forth that there is to be a great Hotel Trust, whose ramifications will extend to the uttermost ends of the earth. This scheme, like the salt "combine," was hatched in England, by a Greek named E. S. Skleros. Curiously enough, "Skleros" in Greek is synonym for all that is hard, austere, cruel, griping, tenacious—certainly the very ideal of a name for a flinty-hearted monopolist. The object of this trust is to limit the number of hotels in each important city throughout the United States, and all parts of the world, and afford its members "reciprocal advantage," which will aim at crushing all independent hostelries out of existence.

The Prairie Farmer is determined to keep its patrons thoroughly posted on the inroads and designing theocracy of monopoly, and, whatever other may do, will continue to raise its warning voice against this giant iniquity. If the legislators of States and Nation will not listen to the people's cry against their oppressors, and grant speedy relief, let the people arise in their might and say, with the voice of a Cromwell, to all who truckle with monopoly, under the guise of being the people's guardians; "Get you gone; and give way to honester men."

John Gould Asked to Explain.

Ed. Hoard's Dairyman:—In the Dairyman of the 4th, we notice that your Honor states that John Gould is feeding ensilage to some Indiana scrub cows. Who would ever thought that John would have been found guilty of stripping scrubs?

Did he not preach unto us, that the only way to be successful dairymen was to start right, with cows possessing heredity for milk, butter motherhood of long standing; and that it cost more to support a scrub, than a well bred cow? It also appears that John preached silo to us before he had any experience!

Now, it puts me in mind, when a boy in Western New York, of a man whom the boys said was a "right lively kind of a cuss," and he took to preaching, because he thought it was an easy way of living and having a good time. During the fifth year of his ministry, on a certain occasion, when he was trying to deal out the salt of salvation to a sinful crowd, he becace thoroughly converted, under his own preaching.

If the Lord should see fit to spare John's life, may he become thoroughly converted under his own preaching, and start in the right way and raise up unto himself a herd of Peitertje's 2d, that give over thirty thousand pounds of milk in a year, or Mercedes that made 99 pounds 6¾ ounces of butter it twenty days; an average of 4 pounds 15½ ounces per day. Or a Jersey Belle of Scituate, with a record of 705 pounds of butter in one year. Eurotas 778 pounds in a year. Did ye not tell us in Mukwonago that a pound of butter had been made from 10¼ pounds of milk taken from a well bred dairy cow?

Why, John, what are you thinking about, when you are stripping those Indiania scrubs? "Start, starter, starting." Startling!

W. C. WARD.

Caldwell, Jan. 7, '89.

John Gould will please take notice that he is called upon to show up what business he has to be milking Indiania scrubs. He will remember that his interlocutor, in the Mukwonago institute, after Wilkinson and McKerrow had pulled all the wool off their sheep; after John True had galloped his horse across the stage; after Hoard had thoroughly milked his Crayon dairy; after "yours truly" had uttered some eloquent silence in "takin' notes;" and he (Gould) had told about all he knew, that Mr. L. C. Ward—the gentleman who calls him to account for milking scrubs—arose and laid out the whole institute force, by showing that each and every one of them knew nothing about farming as a lucrative business, and proceeded to make all our "eyes water" by showing the fabulous wealth he had made (on paper) at raising 160 acres of onions! We explain to John, who is after him, that he may arm himself with the best butter tryer on the Western Reserve.

A Practical Dairy Talk.

New England Farmer.

An interesting institute was recently held for Herkimer County, N. Y. Perhaps the most valuable address of the series was that by Professor Roberts of Cornell. He figured out the cost of wintering dry milch cows in New York State at $2,000,000. To remedy this in part he advised finding out next season by weight the exact amount which each cow gives. This will result in sending one-third of them to the butcher, materially reducing the number to be wintered. He alluded to a succesful dairyman of acquaintance whose cows averaged to pay him $80 per year. The average of a bull from an $80 herd bred to cows that pay only $25 per year would be $52 a cow. This would still further further reduce the immense tax for wintering dry milch cows. He recommended warm, comfortable stables and appetizing food, which latter he said, in a majority of cases, means digestable food. He also condemned obliging cows to drink ice cold water from a brook.

Mr. T. G. Powell said that with warm stables and sweet mature ensilage, winter butter butter can be produced as cheaply as summer butter. His feeding ration is 40 pounds ensilage, 6 of clover hay, 3 quarts of bran, 3 quarts of wheat middlings. All this daily. He prefers a wooden silo to one of harder material, with air space between the outside and inside boards and the walls made air tight with tarred papé. Such a silo costs at the outside $1.50 for each ton of capacity.

State Dairy Commissioner Brown said that last year the gross receipts of his cows were $93 each and the profits $56 each. He thinks he can make butter profitably to sell it at low as 16 cents. Secretary Woodward said that he had purchased this fall fifty skin and-bone farrow cows at 2½ cents perpound. He is going to fatten them during the winter making the butter sell for more than their cost, while the manure improves his farm several hundred dollars. He announces himself a convert to the silo.

Those of the audience who knew how much milk their cows gave last year being asked to hold up their hands, only one hand was raised.

NELSON'S BILL.

The following is the full text of the Nelson bill for the opening of the Red Lake Indian Reservation:

AN ACT for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed, within sixty days after the passage of this act, to designate and appoint three commissioners, one of whom shall be a citizen of Minnesota, whose duty it shall be, as soon as practicable after their appointment, to negotiate with all the different bands or tribes of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota for the complete cession and relinquishment in writing of all their title and interest in and to all the reservations of said Indians in the State of Minnesota, except the White Earth and Red Lake Reservations, and to all and so much of these two reservations as in the judgment of said commission is not required to make and fill the allotments required by this and existing acts, and shall not have been reserved by the Commissioners for said purposes, for the purposes and upon the terms hereinafter stated; and such cession and relinquishment shall be deemed sufficient as to each of said several reservations, except as to the Red Lake Reservation, if made and assented to in writing by two-thirds of the male adults over eighteen years of age of the band or tribe of Indians occupying and belonging to such reservations; and as to the Red Lake Reservation the cession and relinquishment shall be deemed sufficient if made and assented to in like manner by two-thirds of the male adults of all the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota; and provided that all agreements therefor shall be approved by the President of the United States before taking effect: Provided further, That in any case where an allotment in severalty has heretofore been made to any Indian of land upon any of said reservations, he shall not be deprived thereof or disturbed therein except by his own individual consent separately and previously given, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. And for the purpose of ascertaining whether the proper number of Indians yield and give their assent as aforesaid, and for the purpose of making the allotments and payments hereinafter mentioned, the said commissioners shall, while engaged in securing such cession and relinquishment as aforesaid and before completing the same, make an accurate census of each tribe or band, classifying them into male or female adults, and male and female minors; and the minors into those who are orphans and those who are not orphans, giving the exact number of each class, and making such census in duplicate lists, one of which shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior, and the other with the official head of the band or tribe; and the acceptance and approval of such cession and relinquishment by the President of the United States, shall be deemed full and ample proof of the assent of the Indians, and shall operate as a complete extinguishment of the Indian title without any other or further act or ceremony whatsoever for the purposes and upon the terms in this act provided.

SEC. 2. That the said commissioners shall, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, each give a bond to the United States in the sum of ten thousand dollars, with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties under this act, and they shall also each take an oath to support the constitution of the United States, and to faithfully discharge the duties of their office, which bonds and oaths shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior. Said commissioners shall be entitled to a compensation of ten dollars per day for each day actually employed in the discharge of their duties, and for their actual traveling expenses and board, not exceeding three dollars per day. Said commissioners shall also be authorized to employ a competent interpreter while engaged in the performance of their duties, at a compensation and allowance to be fixed by them, not in excess of that allowed each of them under this act.

SEC. 3. That as soon as the census has been taken, and the cession and relinquishment has been obtained, approved and ratified, as specified in section one of this act, all of said Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, except those on the Red Lake Reservation, shall, under the direction of said commissioners, be removed to and take up their residence on the White Earth Reservation, and thereupon there shall, as soon as practicable, under the direction of said commissioners, be allotted lands in severalty to the Red Lake Indians on Red Lake Reservation, and to all the other said Indians on the White Earth Reservation, in conformity with the act of February eighth, eighteen hundred and eighty-seven, entitled "An act for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the territories over the Indians, and for other purposes;" and all allotments heretofore made to any of said Indians on the White Earth Reservation are hereby ratified and confirmed with the like tenure and condition prescribed for all allotments under this act: Provided, however, That the amount heretofore allotted to any Indian on Whith Earth Reservation shall be deducted from the amount of allotment to which he or she is entitled under this act: Provided further, That any of the Indians residing on any of said reservations may, in his discretion, take his allotment in severalty under this act on the reservation where he lives at the time of the removal herein provided for is effected, instead of being removed to and taking such allotment on White Earth Reservation.

SEC. 4. That as soon as the cession and relinquishment of said Indian title has been obtained and approved as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the General Land Office to cause the lands so ceded to the United States to be surveyed in the manner provided by law for the survey of public lands, and as soon as practicable after such survey has been made, and the report, field notes and plats thereof filed in the General Land Office, and duly approved by the Commissioner thereof, the said Secretary of the Interior, upon notice of the completion of such surveys, shall appoint a sufficient number of competent and experienced examiners, in order that the work may be done within a reasonable time, who shall go upon the lands thus surveyed and personally make a careful, complete and thorough examination of the same by forty-acre lots, for the purpose of ascertaining on which lots or tracts there is standing or growing pine timber, which tracts on which pine timber is standing or growing for the purposes of this act shall be termed "pine lands," the minutes of such examination to be at the time entered in books provided for that purpose, showing with particularity the amount and quality of all pine timber standing or growing on any lot or tract, the amount of such pine timber to be estimated by feet in the manner usual in estimating such timber, which estimates and reports of all such examinations shall be filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office as a part of the permanent records thereof, and thereupon that officer shall cause to be made a list of all such pine lands, describing each forty-acre lot or tract thereof separately, and opposite each such description he shall place the actual cash value of the same, according to his best judgment and information, but such valuation shall not be at a rate of less than three dollars per thousand feet, board measure of the pine timber thereon, and thereupon such lists of lands so appraised shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior for approval, modification or rejection, as he may deem proper. If the appraisals are rejected as a whole, then the Secretary of the Interior shall substitute a new appraisal and the same or original list as approved or modified shall be filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office as the appraisal of said lands, and as constituting the minimum price for which said lands may be sold, as hereinafter provided, but in no event shall said pine lands be appraised at a rate of less than three dollars per thousand feet board measure of the pine timber thereon. Duplicate lists of said lands as appraised, together with copies of the field-notes, surveys, and minutes of examinations shall be filed and kept in the office of the register of the land office of the district within which said lands may be situated, and copies of said lists with the appraisals shall be furnished any person desiring the same upon application to the Commissioner of the General Land Office or to the register of said local land office.

The compensation of the examiners so provided for in this section shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, but in no event shall exceed the sum of six dollars per day for each person so employed, including all expenses.

All other lands acquired from the said Indians on said reservations other than pine lands are for the purposes of this act termed "agricultural lands."

SEC. 5. That after the survey, examination and appraisal of said pine lands has been fully completed they shall be proclaimed as in market and offered for sale in the following manner: The Commissioner of the General Land Office shall cause notices to be inserted once in each week for four successive weeks in one newspaper of general circulation published in Minneapolis, St. Paul, Duluth and Crookston, Minnesota; Chicago, Illinois; Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Detroit, Michigan; Philadelphia and Williamsport, Pennsylvania; and Boston, Massachusetts, of the sale of said lands at public auction to the highest bidder for cash at the local land office of the district within which said lands are located, said notice to state the time and place and terms of such sale. At such sale said lands shall be offered in forty-acre parcels, except in case of fractions containing either more or less than forty acres, which shall be sold entire. In no event shall any parcel be sold for a less sum than its appraised value. The residue of such lands remaining unsold after such public offering shall thereafter be subject to private sale for cash at the appraised value of the same upon application at the local land office.

SEC. 6. That when any of the agricultural lands on said reservation not allotted under this act nor reserved for the future use of said Indians have been surveyed, the Secretary of the Interior shall give thirty days' notice through at least one newspaper published at Saint Paul and Crookston, in the State of Minnesota, and at the expiration of thirty days, the said agricultural lands so surveyed, shall be disposed of by the United States to actual settlers only under the provisions of the homested law. Provided, That each settler under and in accordance with the provisions of said homestead laws shall pay to the United States for the land so taken by him the sum of one dollar and twenty-five cents for each and every acre, in five equal annual payments, and shall be entitled to a patent therefor only at the expiration of five years from the date of entry, according to said homestead laws, and after the full payment of said one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre therefor, and due proof of occupancy for said period of five years; and any conveyance of said lands so taken as a homestead, or any contract touching the same, prior to the date of final entry, shall be null and void: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to authorize the sale or other disposal under its provision of any tract upon which there is a subsisting, valid, pre-emption or homestead entry, but any such entry shall be proceeded with under the regulations and decisions in force at the date of its allowance, and if found regular and valid, patents shall issue thereon. Provided, That any person who has not heretofore had the benefit of the homestead or pre-emption law, and who has failed from any cause to perfect the title to a tract of land heretofore entered by him under either of said laws may make a second homestead entry under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That all money accruing from the disposal of said lands in conformity with the provisions of this act shall, after deducting all the expenses of making the census, of obtaining the cession and relinquishment, of making the removal and allotments, and of completing the surveys and appraisals, in this act provided, be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of all the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota as a permanent fund, which shall draw interest at the rate of five per centum per annum, payable annually for the period of fifty years, after the allotments provided for in this act have been made, and which interest and permanent fund shall be expended for the benefit of said Indians in manner following: One-half of said interest shall, during the said period of fifty years, except in the cases hereinafter otherwise provided, be annually paid in cash in equal shares to the heads of families and guardians of orphan minors for their use; and one-fourth of said interest shall, during the same period and with like exception, be annually paid in cash in equal shares per capita to all other classes of said Indians; and the remaining one-fourth of said interest shall, during the said period of fifty years, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be devoted exclusively to the establishment and maintainance of a system of free schools among said Indians, in their midst and for their benefit; and at the expiration of the said fifty years, the said permanent fund shall be divided and paid to all of said Chippewa Indians and their issue then living, in cash, in equal shares: Provided, That Congress may, in its discretion, from time to time, during the said period of fifty years, appropriate, for the purpose of promoting civilization and self-support among the said Indians, a portion of said principal sum, not exceeding five per centum thereof. The United States shall, for the benefit of said Indians, advance to them as such interest as aforesaid the sum of ninety thousaid dollars annually, counting from the time when the removal and allotments provided for in this act shall have been made, until such time as said permanent fund, exclusive of the deductions hereinbefore provided for, shall equal or exceed the sum of three million dollars, less any actual interest that may in the meantime accrue from accumulations of said permanent fund; the payments of such interest to be made yearly in advance, and, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, may, as to three-fourths thereof, during the first five years be expended in procuring live stock, teams, farming implements, and seed for such of the Indians to the extent of their shares as are fit and desire to engage in farming, but as to the rest, in cash; and whenever said permanent fund shall exceed the sum of three million dollars the United States shall be fully reimbursed out of such excess, for all the advances of interest made as herein contemplated and other expenses hereunder.

SEC. 8. That the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay for the procuring the cession and relinquishment, making the census, surveys, appraisals, removal and allotments, and the first annual payment of interest herein contemplated and provided for, which money shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in conformity with the provisions of this act. A detailed statement of which expenses, except the interest aforesaid, shall be reported to Congress when the expenditures shall be completed.

Deep Plowing.

The Prairie Farmer.

To advocate deep plowing will be strongly opposed by many farmers, but, from my experience and observation, I believe if farmers would plow their land deeper, there would be less worn-out and washed-away fields than there are. I know some of my neighbors advocate the idea that to plow land deep will injure it, and claim to have had some of their fields utterly ruined thereby that these fields will not produce anything since. One must exercise judgment in plowing. I will agree that it may suit some soils to break deep at once better than others. Such soils must have more care in the manner in which the breaking is done. In breaking ground you should cut only half the width of the plow. This will turn the soil in such a manner as will distribute the surface-soil evenly from top to bottom of the furrow. you cannot break as much ground in a day' but remember that in a deep, thoroughly-prepared soil lies the secret of a successful crop.

When I began gardening, my land did not have two inches of soil. I had it broken ten inches deep. The man who did the plowing said he would not give five cents an acre for the ground after it was plowed. A great many said I would soon be sick of such ideas, and would quit after it was too late. My crops looked as if their prediction was coming true, but, after they got a start, they grew and made astonishing yelds for such looking soil. Moreover, while my neighbor's vegetables were humble before the scorching sun, mine looked fresh and vigorous.

Deep plowing has not only the advantage of giving the roots of plants a wider range and a greater quantity of food, but it retains moisture better in a season of a drouth, and is not so readily saturated in rainy weather. The gradual mixing of the subsoil with the surface-soil by deep plowing is especially beneficial to lands which have been for a long time under cultivation, and have become partially exhausted. A fresh supply of the inorganic elements is thus furnished for the nourishment of vegetation, and new avenues opened to those powerful agents of fertilizing decomposition—the air and rains. The soil of land cannot be plowed too deep, as, when loose, the roots of vegetables penetrate it more easily than when it is solid. The deeper it is moved and the more it is brought up from below to the top the better, as the properties of that parts which is deepest are the most inert from their not having been operated on by the sun, air and frost, as that on the top has been. The soil which is turned under too, obtains rest and becomes renovated.

Clay, brought up to the top by the plow should have an application of fresh manure, or it will become hard and prevent vegetation from growing. The tops of vegetables cannot well penetrate a stratum of clay above them, but their roots will go through clay to get to water. Clay soil should be broken in the fall that they may have the action of the winter's frost. Great advantage can be derived from breaking up a clay foundation under the soil of several inches in depth with a subsoil plow, as it will enable the clay-ground to receive more water and retain it longer broken. Deep plowing is as beneficial for a sandy as for a clay soil, much of the former as well as the latter having a retentive subsoil, which operates in a two-fold way to the injury of the crop; first, in wet weather, as preventing a glut of water from passing away until it has become putria and poisonous to vegetation, and, next, in a time of drouth, preventing as easy a descent of the roots of plants in search of moisture, which even in the driest season is ever present within a given distance of the surface of the soil. A soil that has sand is a large constituent, or is based on a sandy stratum, can hardly be plowed too deep. Every kind of soil, however, solid or heavy, is comparatively lighter than sand or clay, and these latter, though they may be brought by the action of the plow to the surface, will, because of their greater gravity' in process of time fall again and get below the soil and the cultivation of the land. Frost and water will aid them in falling below. We should be instructed by nature in this matter and respect her arrangement of soil. To turn under a crop of vegetation is only to assist her in its decomposition and conversion to soil.

Experimenting.

The Prairie Farmer.

It is a good plan to experiment on a small scale, to try new methods of planting, manuring and cultivating, to test new varieties, and to ascertain which for your farm is the best. There are so many conditions under which the farmer must work that plants that are best in one locality will not be best in another. We can go farther than that and say that what is best on the farm, one year will not be the best another; so that the best success can only be attained by ascertaining the best that is adapted for your soil, and then being guided by the season in carrying it out. But, like much other work, experimenting can be carried to excess. Small experiments, conducted carefully, so that the results secured can be considered as reasonably accurate, may be made very beneficial. But it is easy to go to an extreme and experment on such a scale as to almost preclude the possibility of a profit.

The farmer who experiments on a large scale very rarely meets with success. It is well enough to try on a small scale, and if the results are satisfactory, enlarge. But changing on a large scale, planting or sowing the whole crop with new, untride varieties, or by an entirely new plan, or growing largely of a crop that heretofore has been left alone, are almost certain to lead to failure to a more or less extent. Continual changing from one crop to another, from one kind of stock to another, or changing the plans of work each year, is experimenting on too a large scale for profit. It is well enough to change when it is reasonably evident that the change is for the best, and this fact can usually be much better ascertained by making the experiment upon a small scale first, and then branching out as may seem best. If the plan is not a success upon a small scale, the loss would be a very small matter; but, if the crop is a failure, the loss may be quite serious—at least sufficient to make it an object to avoid. So, the better plan in nearly all cases is to experiment upon a small scale first and then enlarge, rather than be continually changing about, and thereby increasing the risks.

Fast-Walking Horses.

The Prairie Farmer.

In the Prairie Farmer of Jan. 5 I see an article on fast-walking horses, signed by J. F., who seems to hold that to increase the speed is equivalent to increaseing the power of draft. I can't agree with J. F. on that principle. In the first place, the friction on a '11, 14, or 16-inch plow will be less as you increase the speed, at a given depth, Suppose we plow an acre of ground with a team that walks 3 miles an hour, at a given depth, say, 6 inches, and then plow an acre with a team that walks 4 miles an hour, there is a difference of 40 minute's time in favor of the fast team on one acre, and on 40 acres, 26 hours, 40 minutes, or over two and one-half days.

I venture the assertion, too, that the fast team and man have done the best work with the least muscle and least friction, turned under more stalks and stubble, and had more time to do it in. I don't believe in crowding a team. If you have a slow team, you must go slow; for, if you make them go fast, you will hurt them. I grew up on the farm, almost between the plow-handles, and I want a team that can and will walk on the farm. For all purposes a good sharp walk gives you a good speed in mowing, reaping, plowing, or any thing else, and a good speed always gives you more power with the same draft, as it lessens the fricton.

Wardena Tribune: Gradually the newspaper proprietors throughout the state are combining to maintain full legal rates for all legal notices. This is right and just. As a general thing where newspapers cut on these notices the attorneys reap the benefit. St. Paul and Minneapolis has a number of these legal sharks who are constantly writing for "your lowest terms on mortgage sales," one St. Paul firm even going so far as to offer to have the type set in that city, electrotyped and sent to the printer as any ordinary "electrotype." This, they claim, is an additional reason for the printer to reduce his price. If any one should receive a "cut rate" it is the home attorney, but as a rule he does not ask it. By giving outside attorneys a reduction, loan companies are benefited and are apt to withdraw their forclosures from local attorneys and concentrate them in the hands of legal firms in the larger cities. This hurts local business. The statutes specify the amount that shall be paid and newspaper men who cut below these rates are a disgrace to the profession.

Northfield News: We condemn as strongly as any reasonable person can, intemperance and all its attendant evils, and we also condemn intemperate legislation—half-baked legislation; and we do not believe that forced prohibition is the right way to effect a cure. Intemperance can be kept in check by the rigid enforcement of the present excellent high license law, backed by a harmonious action of all the better social forces of the state. Forced reforms never do any good; reforms that come from education are generally lasting. The Legislature of Minnesota should look carefully before it takes action.

Lake Superior News: Senator Sabin didn't hold the lucky card. Cullom of Illinois, Harris of Tennessee, and Dolph of Oregon are all returned to the senate. Had the vote been popular, instead of legislative, however, and the only candidates Sabin and Washburn, the former would have been re-elected by an overwhelming majority. It is such instances as this that cause the people of the nation to look with growing disfavor upon the present method of electing members of the United States senate. The people are only misrepresented by their representatives.

Northfield News: Because a man duns you, is no reason why you should get angry. A dun is not an impeachment nor reflection upon the intregrity, but simply an outcropping of man's necessities. For instance a thousand men owe one man from one to four dollars each. He has to dun them all, and what a large sum it makes. Instead of getting angry because a man asks for his dues, the debtor should pay him if he can.

RAILROAD MEETING.

A Large and Enthusiastic Gathering of our Citizens.

THE SITUATION DISCUSSED.

The railroad meeting called for 8 o'clock, Thursday evening, was attended by a full representation of the business men of the city, who went to work at once and displayed a harmony of feeling and action, gratifying to behold. J. G. McGrew was chosen chairman, and the following report of the committee who visited St. Paul, was read:

REPORT.

To the Citizens of Crookston:

GENTLEMEN: Your committee appointed by a meeting of the citizens of Crookston, on Jan. 16th, 1889, to examine into the causes of the present depression in trade in this city, and to report upon some method of improvement, respectfully submit the following report:

On January 25th, 1889, on the request of Mr. Manvel, as manager of the St. P. M. & M. Ry. Co., in company with several other citizens of Crookston, we called on Mr. Manvel at his office in St. Paul, and stated briefly to him the condition of affairs in Crookston, and found him well informed in relation to Crookston, especially with reference to its relations to other railroads.

Mr. Manvel stated frankly to the committee, that it was the intention of his company to carry out the promises heretofore made by its president, with reference to location of shops at Crookston, but stated that the present depression in railroad business and the failure of last year's crop, and adverse legislation, would delay the carrying out of those promises. He stated also, that in his opinion, the city would do better to depend upon the Manitoba company to promote its interests than to get in other railroads, and pointed to Fergus Falls and Sauk Centre in proof of his assertion that the second railroad would not necessarily benefit a city. Your committee is of the opinion that Mr. Manvel, in this conversation, stated fairly and truly his belief, of the policy of his company. The committee is of the opinion, from the statement of Mr. Manvel, and his reasons given, that it is not the intention of the Manitoba company to discriminate in any manner against this city; that some of the changes made in train service, and other arrangements, are merely temporary, merely matters of business brought about by the present depression in railroad, as in other business.

Your committee then met at the Merchants' Hotel, St. Paul, and sent some of its members to interview the manager and president of the N. P. R. R. Co. An interview was had with Mr. Oakes, President of the N. P. R. R. Co., on January 26th, 1889, after which the committee met and consulted with each other, and with different persons, with reference to railroad matters, and came to the conclusion from the information received, that it was desirable to procure one or more railroads in Crookston, in addition to the one now here. That at least one other railroad can be secured in the near future and probably before August next.

Your committee believed that the surest and best way of securing another railroad, within a short time, is for the people of Crookston to act in union with each other, to place the matter in the hands of a committee, who will act for the people throughout the whole transaction, and that an act be passed by the legislature authorizing the city of Crookston to issue its bonds for railroad purposes in the sum of $50,000, a part or the whole of which may be voted in the aid of one or more railroads, as may be advisable, when the time comes for such action.

Your committee is fully aware of the importance of such a measure being taken by the city, and believe that the present is the time for action:—that it is necessary to take such measures as will procure this legislation at once. That in the near future the plans of railroad companies, with whom we might now deal, may change, or their locations be otherwise made, or such combinations be made as will prevent the carrying out such arrangements as can now be carried out.

In making these recommendations, it is made purely a business matter, for the interests of our city, and not as a desire to injure any person or any company. We believe the Manitoba company to be as accommodating and of as much importance to our city as any other one company might be. But in this, as in all other matters of business, we believe that two companies can serve us better than one, that business men will have more confidence in investing in new enterprises when they have better facilities for shipping of goods and of reaching a larger territory.

As citizens of Crookston, we believe the interests of our city paramount to all other considerations. We know that we must look after our own interests, that we must help ourselves, that as a city we will be helped by others only so far as their interests dictate. That we will be respected and others will cooperate with us only when we evince a desire and give some evidence that we will be able to assist ourselves. When we, as a city, put forth our energies and act an individual would in a business transaction.

Men who have a friendly interest in this matter, who have means of information, have given us the benefit of their information, and we are of opinion that a corporation of our citizens must be formed to build, or at least to start the building, of a railroad. There will be no profit or benefit in any manner to the individuals of this corporation. The corporation should consist of five persons. The members of this corporation should be selected by your committee, and the corporation controlled and guided by the advice of the committee.

Your committee make the following recommendations:

1. If you are satisfied that your present committee will serve your interests, that their policy is in accordance with your desires, that you continue the same committee.

2. That you add three more persons to that committee.

3. That the committee so constituted select three other persons, thus increasing the committee to eleven.

4. That this committee of eleven control all matters in relation to the building of a railroad, and be only accountable to the citizens of Crookston, when in meeting assembled.

5. That as many of our citizens as practicable at this meeting, or as soon thereafter as possible, sign a petition, asking our legislature to pass such an act as will authorize the city of Crookston to vote to issue bonds of $50,000 to aid in the construction of railroads.

In concluding this report, we suggest for the consideration of the people of Crookston, whether it be wise to sit idly and wait for the performance and fulfillment of promises heretofore made, even admitting that they were made in good faith, and the intention is to carry them out, which in their nature are not expected to be carried out in the near future, until railroads are located in other places and amicable arrangements made between competing companies, by which they are not to invade each other's territory, our population gradually diminishing, our business interests languishing, and depressing influences year after year increasing until we become powerless to help ourselves; then the management of our present railroad may change, or such other changes occur as would alter the plan of this company and make it unwise or unnecessary for them to make any further improvements in our city, thus leaving us for all future time side-tracked, with the knowledge that we had unwisely relied on others' assistance, and had failed, when the opportunity presented itself, to make an effort to improve the situation and better our condition.

We believe that if the course we have indicated can be carried out, and present appearances and advices warrant us in the conclusion that it can be carried out, the city of Crookston may become a railroad centre of much more importance than we believed or hoped for, in the past.

After the reading of the report a discussion ensued, which paved the way for an expression of the meeting as to the feasibility of asking our representatives to work for legislation to the end that the city be in condition to issue bonds in the sum of $50,000 for railroad projects. The vote was unanimously in the affirmative. The chair being authorized to appoint three new members of the committee, has since named F. Bivins, Wm. Watts and N. P. Stone.

The War Lectures, given in McKinnon Hall, on Monday and Tuesday evenings, by H. W. Mercer, were a success, particularly so on Tuesday evening, so far as attendance was concerned. The views were good, and Mr. Mercer's descriptive powers being good, the audienc passed a pleasant evening. Not only were the lectures entertaining, but instructive—an important consideration in these days when intelligent people require something more than mere display for the gratification of their tastes.

Salmagundi Club.

[Communicated.]

On Friday, Feb. 1st was the regular meeting of the Salmagundi club. The evening was unusually mild and clear, and favorable for the plan for some time contemplated of a sleigh ride. The sleighing was beautiful and every one was abroad enjoying the fresh air, in a word the "goose hung high" and so were the spirits of the crowd, when at seven o'clock they started out, four-in-hand, for Mr. McKee's farm. Our sleigh proved very capacious (more capacious than Mother Goose's shoe) for we numbered no less than fourteen. We were all comfortably and securely stowed away, all say comfortably, (I vouch for securely.) Our ride turned out splendidly. There is a peculiar pleasure, after being pent up for a while, in going out of the regular beat and taking a sniff of fresh air, and so we found it. Our journey was perhaps without incident, only we felt sorry for a moment for Mr. A. He had just lost his youthful beard in a snow bank near Sherly, he came now nearly losing his rubbers, and found them only after a diligent search, hidden in a crevice in the bottom of the bobsled. Arriving at Mr. McKee's house in good season, we were variously entertained, among other things by an old fashioned spelling match. It is perhaps unnecessary to speak of some of the easy words that proved stumbling blocks, suffice it to say that the "Prof." came out victor. After being regaled by a hearty supper, soon after we wended our way back again to the city. The participants will not soon forget the episode and will have a grateful recollection of their kind reception by the host and hostess.

QUEEN CITY CHURCHES.

A Mild Day Encourages a Good Attendance at the Various Churches.

The encouraging words given us regarding the notices of churches in our last issue, prompts a continuation of the work, and below we mention the services that have been reported to us:

PRESBYTERIAN.

The service in the morning was well attended, the pastor preaching from Isaiah 52-1. His tracing, side by side, of the temporal and spiritual life of man was carried out in a masterly way, and created an impression on his hearers. The anthem, "How Beautiful Upon the Mountains," by five voices, was well rendered. In the evening, preceding the preaching service, the young people held a meeting, led by E. G. Carruth. The pastor's discourse in the evening was taken from 1st Sam., 15-22, the subject being the rejection of Saul. The services at the church were attended by a packed house, morning and evening. Rev. Harrison preached in the morning, on the duties of parents, and touched many hearts by his earnestness. The attendance at the Sunday School was the largest ever known to the school, 120 being present. A meeting of young people at 3:30 was one of interest. In the evening Rev. Harrison preached, using the parable of the Prodigal Son as his theme. Meetings will be continued three or four weeks longer under the leadership of the pastor and the two gentlemen from Manitoba.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL

BAPTIST

services were conducted as usual. The pastor preached form the text, "Unless the Lord build the house, the building is in vain." The Sunday School was largely attended, and in a brief meeting at the close of the session, several of the scholars expressed an interest in the welfare of their souls. In the evening Rev. Medlar presided over the service which was well attended and opened with a stirring anthem. Rev. Carroll preached a powerful sermon, his theme being, "The Gift of Life, from the Son of God." The church held their usual morning service, the pastor's text being "How long halt ye between two opinions." There was no service in the evening, owing to the union of the two churches in the Baptist church. The church was closed, as it will be next Sunday, owing to the absence of the rector.

CONGREGATIONAL

Almost Drowned.

Red Lake Falls Gazette.

Monday forenoon Angus Campbell, one of the employes on the Holmes dam, was at work on the side of the sluice when he slipped and fell into the rushing water which carried him down stream with great rapidity. After sinking several times he was washed against the ice and was rescued by foreman Hill. When taken from the water, Campbell was unconscious, but soon revived. If Mr. Hill had been delayed one moment, Mr. Campbell would have been washed under the ice and surely drowned.

Hoard's Dairyman: What ails a very large per cent. of the "mixed" and "general purpose" farming of the land, is, that such farmers are trying to get the crops off of 100 acres of land, that ought to be made to grow on 40 acres; and what ails the awfully "mixed" and "general purpose" dairying of the land is, that so-called dairymen are trying to get the butter out of 2½ caseine-fed cows that one good butter cow will produce. There will be a "famine" on that farm so long as such farming prevails, the same as there was in the personal exchequer of the Prodigal Son, after his capital was gone, and no income in sight; and it is minus beside, the "fun he had with the boys," while his patrimony was going.

At Dinner.

From the Boston Globe.

Don't be in a hurry, for hurry implies confusion and disorder. If you are confused you will surely upset a dish either upon yourself or upon your neighbor.

Don't eat with your knife for as some writer has said, "that is a relic of barbarism."

Don't hang your napkin in your collar-button or stuff it inside your collar. It was made to protect your lap, not your necktie.

Don't make a hissing sound when you take soup, or some one may mistake you for a caliope.

When you raise you spoon to your lips raise it laterally to the mouth. Don't bring your elbow around it at right angles with your face.

Don't feel that you must swallow the seeds of raisins and small fruit. That is dangerous.

Don't forget that there are other people at the table as well as yourself, and that you are in duty bound to be as solicitous for their comfort as you would be for your own. Therefore, don't spread yourself all over the table.

Don't "saw your mouth with your napkin, and don't reach in front of another guest to get anything that he might pass you if you had asked for it, assuming, of course, that the waiter was not standing by.

Don't be afraid to be cheerful and happy at the meals. Cheerfulness is full of significance; it suggests good health, a clear conscience, and a soul at peace with all human nature." Cheerfulness is the mother of good digestion.

Don't be afraid to eat hard cheese with the thumb and forefinger. Of course, the soft cheeses will have to be eaten otherwise. Putting a small portion of soft cheese upon your bread with the edge of the knife, as you would butter, is the proper way.

The fore going chapter of "don'ts," if carefully observed, will enable the diffident or those who have not been particularly schooled in etiquette (there is no established school of manners, and newspaper and magazines editors are constantly asked for advice as to the best form for doing thus or so) to escape the Scyllas that may lie in their path.

A good advice is (and mothers should teach it incessantly) to use the fork constantly, and put a little upon it at a time. In this way the food is conveyed to the mouth—never with the knife—although in some countries this mode is still kept up, even amongst royalty. Although manners are not a science, and we have no standard to judge by, yet etiquette is always the admitted legislator of the present, and we must conform to its laws.

If you have strawberries and cream, soup, melons, stewed fruit, preserves and jellies eat them with a spoon. These things because of their juiciness, cannot be eaten with a fork, and every well-regulated house, when it serves oysters on the half shell, will place a small silver fork beside each guest's plate.

When the hostess serves strawberries with the green stems, then they are invariably to be taken up in the fingers (by the stem) and eaten one at a time.

Fruit like pears and apples is first peeled, then quartered and then taken up in the fingers and eaten.

With salads the knife and fork is used, if the salad has not been cut up before being served.

No hostess who understands table etiquette, nor a waiter who has been well trained, will ever think of offering you more than a ladle full of soup, and if you are at private or fashionable dinner (anywhere except a hotel), and the dinner is too hot, or you do not happen to like a certain dish after it has been severd; pretend to eat it, and this consideration on your part will make you the everlasting friend of the host and hostess. Don't stop short and sit back in your chair. That is the most embarrassing kind of embarrassment for both yourself, your host, and your associates.

Your napkin is to protect your lap. With the corners you may when necessary gently wipe the mouth. Men with bushy mustaches are permitted to do a little vigorous rubbing, or, as it is aptly termed, "sawing." This would be unpardonable in men with smooth faces.

A Million Insect Species.

The State Entomologist of New York, in a recent report, writes: In number of species, insects far exceed all other classes of the animal kingdom combined, mammals, birds, reptiles, fishes, crustaceans, worms, etc., etc. The number already known is immense; and the new species that are being continually added to our lists, as the results of an increased number of observers, more thorough collections, and more extended explorations are constantly enlarging the estimates which naturalists from time to time present of the probable number existing throughout the world. The discovery of new forms is ever in advance of the ability of entomologists to give them description, name, and classification. There are to-day in the British Museum no less than 12,000 species of insects yet undescribed, and like unworked material is to be found in every collection of any extent in both hemispheres. Fifty years ago 70,000 species had been described, and it was then thought that there were at least twice that number in existence. The scientific activity of the past half century has more than quadrupled that number, and there are now 320,000 described species. In view of this rapid increase, it will not be safe to assume that even yet one-half of the number has been described. From our present knowledge, and from the vast extent of the globe, which is still in natural science, terra incognita, it does not seem improbable that the number of species in the world may reach a million.

More Sleep.

When the days are long and hot, when the nights are short and a person is not cool enough to sleep until late, there is much danger that the housekeeper will not see to it that she has enough sleep for the keeping up of her strength.

It is, of course, much the wiser plan to get up early, and do the heavy part of the day's work in the cool time of the morning, even though one be so sleepy it seems very hard to get to work. However, this sleepiness soon wears off, and the work goes easily and well at that time of day.

The farmer and his men are at their work as early as the housekeeper, and so are ready for the early hearty dinner, which must be prepared over the hot stove. After the dinner is eaten the men folks always gives themselves a half-hour or more of rest, but the women of the house must, or think they must, immediately clear the table, and it is seldom much less hot in the dish-water than over the stove. When the dinner work is done, if no extra housework calls, there is always the mending basket, or if nothing be pressing the average woman begins to sew carpet rags or piece a quilt.

We see much in the papers nowadays about the fact that insanity is very prevalent among women of farmers' homes. This is accounted for in many ways—"overwork," "monotonous existence," and occasionally some wise men say, "too little sleep."

If women who have to work for farm hands, if women who carry heavy housework year in and year out, would deliberately make up their minds to take a midday nap, they would find in the long run that they could do more and better work, and come out of heated work with better nerve, than if they tried to work every minute of the day. The few minutes of daylight sleep will come back laden with manifold riches of strength. It is useless for a woman to say she cannot sleep in daytime. If any one will lie down quietly and close the eyes one-half hour per day, at the same time every day for two weeks, there will be no trouble about not being able to sleep in daytime. For many people the half-hour per day is sufficient rest to help keep good strength all day. The sleep at night will be all the better for it, because the nerves will not be so worn and tired as to make one restless.

No one can make a rule that will apply to one as to the proper amount of sleep necessary; but one thing is sure—any woman had better err on the side of too much sleep, than run any risk as to wearing out her nerves, which work on too little sleep is sure to do.

Children, too, are sometimes abused by those who love them best by being obliged to get up to breakfast whether their sleep is "out" or not. They will wake up of their own accord when they have slept enough.

We women do too much work in many directions. We sew too much, we (some of us) scrub to much, and many a one cleans for hard hours at a time when a very few minutes of care-taking would have prevented the necessity for the cleaning.

If we would take a nap in the midst of the day, and by forethought save the time from unnecessary work, we might live longer to do work. One frail, delicate woman, who has been able all her life to keep her home pleasant and her five children happy, thinks her success all due to the fact that she sleeps twenty minutes every afternoon; her nerves are rested, her body and mind refreshed, and her strength renewed, so that she does not become overtired before night. She began the habit when she first began to keep house, and learned to always take the time for it because it was economy in the end.

We hear much about woman's rights, but no woman uses all the rights that are accorded her unless she makes of herself physically the young woman she has a right to be, then increases her mental strength to what it should and can become. When the majority of women do there will be no question as to the status she will have in the home, the neighborhood and the nation.

If more home mothers will sleep more they will be stronger women for all duties that come. Then don't let any one feel that the person who takes an every-day nap is wasting time, but rather let it become "the proper thing to do." Let every woman feel amount of sleep for every day that Summer brings, as it is her duty to fill her days with earnest labor.

Many of us can "bless the man who first invented sleep," but we do not take our full blessing, and while we gain a little time we waste strength, forgetting that our time will some day give out.

Let the women of the land have more sleep, and we shall hear less complaint of the miseries of hot weather.—Mrs Kedzie, in Philadelphia Press.

Training a Bull-Dog.

From the Detroit Free Press.

A hard-looking citizen, with a ferocious white bull-dog attached to a chain, attracted a good deal of attention on the front end of a Fort street car. The dog's legs and body were covered with an inch of mud, and he trotted alongside the moving car, tugging at his chain, it took all the owner's strength to hold him.

"Where are you going with the dog?" was asked.

"Nowhere," replied the man; "only working him."

"Got a match for him?"

"Yes; comes off next Saturday night in Delray. He's in pretty good shape and I guess he's a winner. A street car is the best place in the world to work a dog on. If you can run him under a buggy his throat gets full of mud from the horse's feet. A tread-mill is no use, because it worries the heart out of him. But a street car takes the cake, and especially this line, because you can ride twelve miles for a nickel. A man can reduce a dog at the rate of three pounds a day by running him alongside a street car."

The Locusts in Literature.

In these later years of the Nineteenth century "everybody writes;" and from the fashionable lady who cannot spell to the tight rope dancer who dictates his "Impression from an Altitude" any one who has any grain of vanity, or shred of adventure, embodies his or her ideas or recollections in an article for a periodical or a volume for the circulating libraries. Whether a physician becomes illustrious through a patient's death, or a comic singer has pleased a London or Paris audience, whether an artist has painted a ginshop, or a sculptor has carved a clown, whether a general has won a battle, a clergyman has been imprisoned by his bishop, or a lady been distinguished in a divorce suit, one and all of these will forthwith publish something, article, monograph, novelette, essay, reminiscence, or the letters of somebody else, without the slightest regard to whether they possess any literary capabilities for the work or not. If the public has ever heard of them in any capacity, whether marching through a savage country or singing a music hall ditty, whether speaking at a public meeting or rebutting a criminal charge in the dock, they will all write, and they will all find editors, publishers, and publics ready to receive them.

A war may become impossible through all nations being armed to the teeth; it may also prove in the future that writing and publishing what is written will become so general that it will cease altogether. Other methods than those now used may most likely supersede printing; but, whatever the practial means pursued in the future to perpetuate and generalize human thought, it is certain that, if the "making of books" (or their equivalents) continues to increase at the rate at which it has increased in last twenty years it will become so frightful a burden, so sickly a plague, that it will cease to have any life or meaning in it, as a locust swarm perishes of famine from its multitude.—Ouida.

Walking Lovers.

Washington Corr. Philadelphia Record.

Lovers who cannot get married for one reason or another, usually not entirely disconnected with money questions, are found in every town. But it seems to me that there are more known cases of this sad sort of living in Washington than in any other city. "Walking lovers" they are commonly called, because in many instances they can only meet on the street. Stern parents or gossiping companions make it impracticable or unpleasant to meet in the usual way at the girl's home, and so they go strolling along the streets or through the parks amid the universal sympathy of so much of the world as loves a lover.

The half hour at noon which most of the departments give to the employes for lunching purposes is the time when most of these old lovers walk, for many of them are in the departments and cannot afford to surrender a salary by marrying. Some of them have been walking through the lunch hour thus hopelessly for years. There is no probability that they will ever get married. But there is nothing to prevent their walking up and down together. Now and then, however, one of these couples whom we have seen among the walking lovers for years either gets some windfall from fortune's tree or gets desperate—in either event getting married. Then we all congratulate them in our hearts, whether we have ever been introduced to them or not, for we feel that they are old friends with whom we do well to rejoice.

The Maiden Lady Was Startled.

An amusing story comes to me of a well-known artist in this city who is afflicted with a maiden aunt of uncertain age. This venerable lady has a knack of changing her boarding house about once a month, and on these occasions she invariably desires the attendance of her nephew to assist in packing and moving. At length the nephew became irritable at the loss of time and temper consequent upon these peregrinations, and on receiving the usual monthly summons decided on dispatching his stalwart Irish model, Mike, to his aunt's aid.

"Mike," said he, "go up to this address at once; the lady has something for you to do."

"Roight, sorr," replied Mike, who had no idea but that he was going to pose for a lady artist. In due time Mike presented himself at the house.

"Oh my nephew has sent you, has he? Well, what do you charge?"

"Well, mum," answered the son of Erin, "my price is fifty cents an hour draped, and a dollar an hour nude!"

The artist's name no longer figures in the old lady's will, nor have any assurances on his part made her believe that anything but a deliberate insult was intended.—St. Louis Critic.

A Tragic-comic Romance.

Paris Dispatch to the London Telegraph.

A stripling of 17, residing with his parents at Buda-Pesth, Hungary, fell in love with a girl three years his junior, and these children were in such despair at the prospect of having to wait so long before they could be married that they decided to commit sricide. Their last meeting was behind the Custom-house. Tears were shed on either side, and some kissing and hugging was gone through. The juvenile couple then repaired to the Danube, and with a fortitude worthy of a better cause the young lady jumped in. Fortunately she could swim, and availed herself fully of her capabilities in that art. She shrieked for "help," which was soon at hand. Just as she was safely landed her lover fired three revolver shots against himself, but none of them took effect, and a quarter of an hour later the young folks were handed over to their respective parents.

THE CONQUEROR CONQUERED.

In southern archipelagoes he'd fought the bloody cannibal;
He'd skinned and tanned the crocodile and found him very tannable,
Not a word of fear he'd uttered, not a word and not a syllable.
When he killed the Bengal tiger, and he found him very killable.

He claimed his strength was very great, for bears and lions suitable;
He used to boot the grizzly bear and found him very bootable;
He claimed in killing monstrous snakes that he was very capable.
No boa constrictor could escape, for he was unescapable.

In fighting hippopotami, he said he was invincible.
No jaguar could make him wince, because he wasn't winceable;
He made the ramping elephant no longer recognizable;
And pulverized the roaring bull, and found him pulverizable.

Just then his wife came in and said," "I'd think it quite commendable,
If you'd come and 'tend the baby, and you'll find him very tendable."
The way she took him by the ear will make this poem readable;
She pulled him out and lead him home, and found him very leadable.

LOVE'S STRATAGEM.

Lieut. Marshall clanked into his diminutive quarters helmeted and sworded.

"Hail, guardian of the fort!" cried Mrs. Marshall, looking up from the perusal of a letter from home. "Did you have a very horrible night?"

"So, so."

These nights on guard were always horrible in Mrs. Marshall's mind, and so unnecessary, she grumbled, in piping times of peace. No Indians within five hundred miles; no labor riots. She did not believe in works of supererogation.

Marshall was saying, "In time of peace prepare for war," sleepily, when an orderly rapped. "Hullo! here's active service for you"—reading the paper handed in by the orderly. Betty came and read over her husband's shoulder. "I am not sure that I like this kind of police duty, however,"

"'August twentieth.' That's tomorrow, Tom. 'An escort of ten men. To pursue and arrest and bring back to jail in Green River Jas. O'Leary.' What does it all mean?"

"O'Leary is the fellow who broke into Jones jewelry store in Green River the other day. He is a desperate character, I hear; escaped from Texas a few months ago, where he was awaiting trial for manslaughter. I wish the Green River people would look after their own rascals. And why should the colonel pitch on me to go? Just off the guard, too, and as seedy as you please."

Betty sympathized with him fully, of course; you might be sure of that. Tom's grievances eased off in that sunshine. He picked himself up presently, and went back to the guard-house to turn over his responsibilities to his immediate successor; then to see the colonel, and glean particulars in regard to the morrow's expedition. It was borne in upon him that the colonel had proposed to compliment him by this detail. "If I can only keep my eyes open," he said to himself, strolling down the line from the colonel's office, gazing at a photograph of the escaped burglar, which had been handed him. Two or three officers were standing on the porch talking to Betty when he came up. He showed the photograph.

"O'Leary, his countenance," said one of these. "Old Jim, they call him, because he was christened John, and because he looks like a babe. If we were in San Antonia now, and you caught him and brought him back to the jail there, the chances are he would be linched. He has a very unenviable reputation down that way. He's been wanted in Texas a long time—wanted badly."

"Who is it he looks like?" Betty wondered.

"One of Raphael's cherubs? No; they're too fat and jolly. A mediæval saint."

"I don't believe he has done all those dreadful things," cried Betty, still gazing.

Tom took the photograph from her and turned to go in-doors, the other young men moving on.

"I have to be off before dark, Betty I take my men into Green river, and start from there with the constable and one or two of his myrmidons."

Betty followed him into the house. "Do get a good sleep, dearest," she said, "and by the time you are about again dinner will be ready."

Tom got off duly, cheered and speeded by his wife and her cook. The latter displayed unusual energy, asking more questions than Mrs. Marshall could answer as to the burglar at large and the efforts being made to capture him. This cook was a young woman of twenty-four or so, of a type that one walking in the beaten path is more apt to find in Bret Harte's novels than in real life. But life as a frontier post is hardly the beaten path. Betty had remarked of her hand-maiden that she might have been brought up anyhow, and come from anywhere, and done anything. Once, going out suddenly into the kitchen, she discovered the cook mounted on a table singing a variety theater ditty, with appropriate gestures, to two other neighboring cooks and an enlisted man or two. There was a racy abandon about this performance which suggested to Mrs. Marshall that the singer was at home behind the footlights.

"It makes me creep," Betty told Tom, "to think how she has probably been knocked about the world. Her father was a miner, and she was brought up in that kind of atmosphere—excitement, false hopes, and disappointment.

"Married, I dare say," supplemented Tom. "And put a bullet through the fellow's head, and then has taken up with one or two others."

"Yes, yes." Betty dropped her voice to an awe-struck whisper. "She actually showed me the photograph of a friend of hers who she said was 'in' for five years—in (such a dreadful word!) for bigamy. In prison at Leavenworth."

"Why don't you get rid of her?" cried Tom, briskly. "She's a beastly cook; I know that."

But in spite of her questionable antecedents the mistress' heart went out to the maid with the same instinct which had prompted her at the east to visit dingy tenement-houses and pauper wards in hospitals. There was a responsiveness, an affectionateness, about the cook to the attraction of which Betty succumbed. Besides, the girl was pretty, with a slender rounded figure, and brilliantly bright hazel eyes, a fair, pure skin and soft golden brown hair. These charms increased after she had lived a decent quiet life with the Marshalls or two or three months, and a certain haggard look disappeared.

To be sure, she had been a little off her head for the last week or so. She had looked in the morning as though she had not closed her eyes the night before; she had returned to a former habit, which had yielded to Mrs. Marshall's expostulations, of going about until high noon her head tied up. "So fearfully uncheerful," complained Betty. Moreover, she was peevish and fretful. There was altogether an air, unmistakable to the housekeeper, of uncertain tenure of office about her, which struck a chill to Betty's heart. This young lady was as wedded to present ways as a cat. All change had a vague element of terror for her.

Hence it was with a sense of relief that she remarked that her Mary was aroused from her apathy and indifference by the fact of Lieut. Marshall's unexpected orders. She was as communicative as possible, pleased at having hit upon a subject of interest. Still she kept recurring to the strong impression that Mary was an odd creature. She had forgotten something, and went back to the kitchen unexpectedly. There stood Mary in the middle of the room, her clenched slender fist pressed against her temples, her bright dark eyes gazing out before her with fixed intensity of concentration; poised on her small arched feet as though about to spring; she suggested an alert, trapped creature at bay. What an untamed, problematical girl, and what a mixed civilization had produced her! Meantime all well-balanced house-keepers will agree that Mrs. Marshall was most unfortunate in having such an unsuitable cook, were she ever so devoted to the regeneration of humanity.

Dusk was gathering about the post when Mrs. Marshall betook herself to the front door and looked up and down the line of quarters and across the parade-ground and wished for Tom. A man came rapidly down the plank walk, paused, and addressed her.

"Does Mrs. Escadero live here?"

It was a second before Betty remembered that that was the elegant name of her cook." "Yes, the does."

"Can I see her? I'm a brother of hers."

Betty looked up with pleased interest. A lamp was lighted near by at the moment, and brought out the slender features and fair hair of her complection's striking face, and which was also strikingly like Mary's. He seemed quite a boy; younger than Mary; or perhaps it was the expression. He had a quick, bright, boyish smile that flashed upon Betty before he moved into the shadows of the porch.

"I will call your sister, or you can look her up yourself if you choose. Through that gate; the kitchen is at the end of the yard. You will find her there."

"Thank you, ma'am," said the young fellow, and disappeared through the gate.

Afterward some friends came in, and there was a game of whist, a frugal, impromptu supper followed. A friend offered to stay all night if Betty was nervous at being left alone; but this she rejected and scorned the notion of fear. Nor was she in the least afraid; it was part of her creed that a soldier's wife should have a stout heart. She made a pretense of closing doors and windows for the night, saying all the while in her heart that it was a waste of strength to take these precautions in a place so carefully parolled. Finally she went out into the kitchen to say a last word to Mary. She found the kitchen deserted. A lamp was burning high, the flame blown about in a draught from the open door. She closed the door and looked about her. Another door led upstairs to a loft adjoining her own room; it occurred to her to shoot the bolt, which was on the outside. Some one might slip in and up while Mary is out." On her way upstairs she laughed at herself for having done this. How silly of her the bolt could be slipped back again in a moment. Once in her room, it occurred to her that the door leading from her room into the garret was the one to make fast. But on examination it proved to have no fastenings.

She heard Mary come to the room she occupied at the head of the stairs presently, hesitate, then go into her room, but without closing the door.

"That is nice of Mary," reflected the little mistess. "She thinks I am afraid," And she smiled to herself at the notion.

Still, for all she could not sleep. She tossed restlessly for awhile, half lost herself in troubled dreams, sat in bed broad-awake, and longed for day. "Goodness me its a mouse!" she thought, hearing subdued, annoying noises in the adjoining attic. "I wish it were the cat."

The gray dawn reassured her. The night's mysteries were vanished; familiar objects in her room assumed distinctness; speculation no longer lurked in corners. She closed her eyes and slept.

She awoke suddenly. Her bed was drawn close to the door of the attic aforesaid. That door had been opened very softly, but it had jarred the bed. A figure stood holding the door, closing it very gently—a man's figure, slight, fair hair. She saw so much, then closed her eyes in an instinct of self-preservation, but not before she had recognized the man who had asked for Mrs. Escadero the night before. He wore a soft felt hat, as he had done then, and he carried his boots in one hand. He had evidently spent the night in the loft, after being stowed away there by his sister. Betty, in fact, had locked him in, and Mary had come up to her room without noticing the shot bolt. All this flashed across Mrs. Marshall in a second, as also his extraordinary likeness to her cook, which to be sure, she had remarked the night before. It was one of those all-over likenesses, attitude, action, expression—unmistakable.

Betty did not stir. The man's hope was to slip through the room without rousing her; and if she was feigning, as his sharpened senses may have guessed, it suited his purpose to accept this situation. He had weighed his chances, and this was the best his only one. His sister had given him the geography of the house the night before, and he had rapidly decided to come this way on discovering awhile ago that egress below was barried. He stealthily crossed the room, found his sister (she was his sister) sitting up wide-eyed in bed, as alert as he, as quick to comprehend what had happened; ready, in pursuance of a precious plan, to help him put on a suit of her clothes, including an ulster, and to dress herself in the gray clothes he wore. Not a word was uttered meanwhile. It might have been Mary only, rising betimes and stirring about as she made ready to begin her day's work. In fact, as Mrs. Marshall lay there, she wondered in the whirl of her excited, startled brain, weary too with night's sleeplessness, whether she had not dreamed that a slight, fair man had stood a second at her bedside on his way through her room.

No, it had been no dream. The pair went down-stairs presently, and out of the front door. Then Betty rushed to the window in time to see them—a man and a woman—cross the parade-ground, making for the little railroad station, which lay just outside the post.

"She is taking him to the cars; he is in some trouble," Betty decided. "Just what might be expected from that wild west creature. What an extraordinary resemblance between them! Poor soul! I hope she will get him off."

She was all for defeating the ends of justice in her sympathy for her attractive cook. She had a distinct impression that the latter numbered jail-birds of all kinds among her friends; this was probably one of them. Still, she hoped he would get off.

They just made the train. Betty stood by the window shivering in her night-dress, and heard the whistle shrill, and saw the cars sweep up and linger an instant, and then sweep on again. She watched next to see Mary come back across the parade-ground. She would come in quietly and go about her work as though nothing had occurred. Her mistress would make no sign; in truth, her strongest feeling was sympathy and pity. She did wish that Mary had given her her confidence; she need not have smuggled her brother in and out in that way. But, again, it would never have done to tell if the man was a fugitive from justice. Poor soul! poor soul! This accounted for her despairing looks yesterday.

But how long she was getting back! Mrs. Marshal went back to bed again presently, and, tired out, dozed off to sleep, and slept an hour in spite of herself. She awoke suddenly, recalled the events of the past night, and pulled herself together. Nine o'clock. She would get up and dress.

She hurried through her toilette, somewhat spurred by a vague misgiving. When she went down-stairs she found the house quite deserted, save for the soldier who worked about the house, and was known as their striker, and who on this occasion had kindled the kitchen fire, and was now standing around that apartment awaiting farther developments.

"Cook deserted?" he inquired, easily. Such desertions were common enough in that region. "Seen her git aboard the train this mornin'. Said she was tired of working. Had her brother along. Her twin, she said. Like as two peas in a pod."

So the fact of Mary's departure was established. Mrs. Marshall made the best of it; made herself some coffee, went into Green river in the mid-day ambulance, secured another servant, whom she brought back with her, and congratulatrd herself that Tom had been out of the way during this domestic flury. "Especially during last night's occupation." It did not occur to her that if Tom had not gone, Mary's brother would not have come.

That day went by. At the middle of the next one Tom returned.

"Did you catch the burglar?" his wife asked, after a joyful welcome.

"No; he got away from us. I see you've replaced your Prairie Rose," nodding in the direction of the Irish girl who was laying the lunch-table in the next room. "I brought her back with me all the same—as far as Green river, that is."

"What do you mean?"

"That the governor of this territory has retained Mary Escadero as a witness in the case of the state versus James O'Leary. They turn out to be brother and sister."

Mrs. Marshall stared at her husband in a dazed way. Then the whole thing began to dawn upon her. "Oh, Tom!" She rapidly sketched her adventures during his absence.

"By jingo! you are a plucky little soul! No screaming? no fainting? no hysterics? But, you poor little chicken, it was pretty rough on you."

Betty scorned these compliments. "I was not afraid in the least. I was excited and over-wrought and absorbed in the situation. It did not dawn upon me who the man was. I should have turned to stone if I had dreamed it was O'Leary standing over me." And she shuddered. "When I watched Mary walk across the parade ground with him, my idea was that he had done something, of course—stolen a horse, or forged, or—"

"Some trifle of that sort. But now for my story."

He had tramped over the prairies with his escort for hours before coming upon a trace of the man he was looking for. These wanderings had brought him to a part of the country crossed by the railroad that skirted the post and near a river. It was a rolling country, so that the view was broken between short given points. The scouting party separated in order to command the whole field. All at once one of the soldiers saw a boat pat off from the shore and gain mid-stream with a few rapid strokes; a woman held the oars. At the same time a man clamored back up the steep river bank, having first pushed the boat off; the bank was very steep, and had probably concealed the party of soldiers from his view. Having gained the top, he paused to recover breath, then in full view of Lieutenant Marshall, who instantly identified him with the object of his search. He signaled to his men and they had surrounded and captured O'Leary, or so they thought, in a twinkling.

Their prisoner made little or no resistance. He started to run at first to be sure, but after giving one rabid anxious glance across the river, where his companion had landed, and where she was speedily lost to sight behind the high bank and rolling hillocks on that side, he submitted to the inevitable and to be captured.

It was not until they were all back again in Green River that it was discovered that they were not bringing back O'Leary at all, but his sister, Mary Escadero, the Marshalls' cook. And by that time O'Leary himself was in safety, far enough away.

"Recognize her? Not I," said Tom. "I recognized him from the photograph I had with me. I believe it did cross my mind that my prisoner resembled your Prairie Rose; but I merely regarded it as a confidence. She says they are twins. It's an odd thing now that a precious rascal like that should be able to inspire such devotion. I declare to you, Betty, I don't believe that woman had a thought of herself in the matter."

And Betty, having the lukewarm attachments and feeble friendships and changing loves of respectable people, felt a stir at the heart as she remembered that from the beginning outcasts have passed into the kingdom of heaven, whose name is also Love. The sins of these wild O'Learys or Escaderos, or whatever their name might be, were many, no doubt. Please God! there was a balance in their favor, kept by a merciful recording angel.—Harper's Bazar.

A West Virginia Diana.

The most celebrated hunters of the section are Bob Eastman, Jule Baker, a woman, and Louis Chidester. There is a law to protect deer, but it is not observed. Out of season venison is called mountain mutton. Jule Baker is the wife of Joan Baker, and lives near the mouth of Black Water fork. She can handle a Winchester with the dexterity and precision of Old Leatherstocking, and hundreds of deer and bear have fallen victims to the unerring bullets from her rifle. Bob Eastman says he saw her plunging down the mountain side through six inches of snow one day, with two rifles and a bear trap strapped to her back and followed by six dogs. She ran three miles to a point where she thought a deer in full-chase would cross, and she got there in time to see her husband kill him. She is a big black haired woman, very industrious, with a heart as large as a foot, and she is the mother of seven children. She is not pretty. A few months ago, far a silver dollar, she carried a valise weighing over 100 pounds seven miles for an engineer. It is said that on one occasion she carried a sewing machine from Grafton to her home, a distance of sixty miles.—Baltimore American.

One Way of Paying a Debt.

A foreign journal tells the following story: Not long ago a certain pacha of exhalted position borrowed a sum of money from a Frenchman, and when the time for repayment came he was unable to raise the required amount. "But," said he, "I cannot give you money, for I have none, I can at least give you a lucrative post—namely, the repairing of the tombs of the sultans, which are in a bad state, and you can remove those old tiles which are not cared for, and replace them by modern ones made in France." Needless to say this post was willingly accepted, and on setting to work the delighted Frenchman discovered in a vault of one of the tombs, a whole heap of ancient titles, which provident Turks of a bygone age had put there with a view to restoration, but of the existence of which the Turks of this generation were ignorant. Endless cases of valuable titles were thus collected and dispatched to France, and when it was found absolutely necessary to make restoration, cheap new titles from France were put up, and thus did the French creditor make over and over again the sum of money he advanced to the pacha.

Belgium Will Have no Portias.

From the St. James' Gazette.

We regret to see that the Belgian court has decided that Mlle. Popelin cannot be admitted to the bar. The judges took the old stereotyped ground—namely, that woman has other social duties to perform, and that the law and customs of the country did not allow a woman to exercise the profession of a barrister. The right of "the law and the customs of the country" to decide what are the social duties of any particular facts of the community is an act of usurpation which is indefensible. The Career open to all talents is a formula which should not be limited by the sex of those who possess the talents. "The tools to him who can use them"—or to her—and if women can plead effectually at the bar, why in the name of goodness should they not do so?

At Dinner.

From the Boston Globe.

Don't be in a hurry, for hurry implies confusion and disorder. If you are confused you will surely upset a dish either upon yourself or upon your neighbor.

Don't eat with your knife for as some writer has said, "that is a relic of barbarism."

Don't hang your napkin in your collar-button or stuff it inside your collar. It was made to protect your lap, not your necktie.

Don't make a hissing sound when you take soup, or someone may mistake you for a caliope.

When you raise you spoon to your lips raise it laterally to the mouth. Don't bring your elbow around it at right angles with your face.

Don't feel that you must swallow the seeds of raisins and small fruit. That is dangerous.

Don't forget that there are other people at the table as well as yourself, and that you are in duty bound to be as solicitous for their comfort as you would be for your own. Therefore, don't spread yourself all over the table.

Don't "saw your mouth with your napkin, and don't reach in front of another guest to get anything that he might pass you if you had asked for it, assuming, of course, that the waiter was not standing by.

Don't be afraid to be cheerful and happy at the meals. Cheerfulness is full of significance: it suggests good health, a clear conscience, and a soul at peace with all human nature." Cheerfulness is the mother of good digestion.

Don't be afraid to eat hard cheese with the thumb and forefinger. Of course, the soft cheeses will have to be eaten otherwise. Putting a small portion of soft cheese upon your bread with the edge of the knife, as you would butter, is the proper way.

The fore going chapter of "don'ts," if carefully observed, will enable the diffident or those who have not been particularly schooled in etiquette (there is no established school of manners, and newspaper and magazines editors are constantly asked for advice as to the best form for doing thus or so) to escape the Scyllas that may lie in their path.

A good advice is (and mothers should teach it incessantly) to use the fork constantly, and put a little upon it at a time. In this way the food is conveyed to the mouth—never with the knife—although in some countries this mode is still kept up, even amongst royalty. Although manners are not a science, and we have no standard to judge by, yet etiquette is always the admitted legislator of the present, and we must conform to its laws.

If you have strawberries and cream, soup, melons, stewed fruit, preserves and jellies eat them with a spoon. These things because of their juiciness, cannot be eaten with a fork, and every well-regulated house, when it serves oysters on the half shell, will place a small silver fork beside each guest's plate.

When the hostess serves strawberries with the green stems, then they are invariably to be taken up in the fingers (by the stem) and eaten one at a time.

Fruit like pears and apples is first peeled, then quartered and then taken up in the fingers and eaten.

With salads the knife and fork is used, if the salad has not been cut up before being served.

No hostess who understands table etiquette, nor a waiter who has been well trained, will ever think of offering you more than a ladle full of soup, and if you are at private or fashionable dinner (anywhere except a hotel), and the dinner is too hot, or you do not happen to like a certain dish after it has been severd; pretend to eat it, and this consideration on your part will make you the everlasting friend of the host and hostess. Don't stop short and sit back in your chair. That is the most embarrassing kind of embarrassment for both yourself, your host, and your associates.

Your napkin is to protect your lap. With the corners you may when necessary gently wipe the mouth. Men with bushy mustaches are permitted to do a little vigorous rubbing, or, as it is aptly termed, "sawing." This would be unpardonable in men with smooth faces.

A Million Insect Species.

The State Entomologist of New York, in a recent report, writes: In number of species, insects far exceed all other classes of the animal kingdom combined, mammals, birds, reptiles, fishes, crustaceans, worms, etc., etc. The number already known is immense; and the new species that are being continually added to our lists, as the results of an increased number of observers, more thorough collections, and more extended explorations are constantly enlarging the estimates which naturalists from time to time present of the probable number existing throughout the world. The discovery of new forms is ever in advance of the ability of entomologists to give them description, name, and classification. There are to-day in the British Museum no less than 12,000 species of insects yet undescribed, and like unworked material is to be found in every collection of any extent in both hemispheres. Fifty years ago 70,000 species had been described, and it was then thought that there were at least twice that number in existence. The scientific activity of the past half century has more than quadrupled that number, and there are now 320,000 described species. In view of this rapid increase, it will not be safe to assume that even yet one-half of the number has been described. From our present knowledge, and from the vast extent of the globe, which is still in natural science, terra incognita, it does not seem improbable that the number of species in the world may reach a million.

More Sleep.

When the days are long and hot, when the nights are short and a person is not cool enough to sleep until late, there is much danger that the housekeeper will not see to it that she has enough sleep for the keeping up of her strength.

It is, of course, much the wiser plan to get up early, and do the heavy part of the day's work in the cool time of the morning, even though one be so sleepy it seems very hard to get to work. However, this sleepiness soon wears off, and the work goes easily and well at that time of day.

The farmer and his men are at their work as early as the housekeeper, and so are ready for the early hearty dinner, which must be prepared over the hot stove. After the dinner is eaten the men folks always gives themselves a half-hour or more of rest, but the women of the house must, or think they must, immediately clear the table, and it is seldom much less hot in the dish-water than over the stove. When the dinner work is done, if no extra housework calls, there is always the mending basket, or if nothing be pressing the average woman begins to sew carpet rags or piece a quilt.

We see much in the papers nowadays about the fact that insanity is very prevalent among women of farmers' homes. This is accounted for in many ways—"overwork," "monotonous existence," and occasionally some wise men say, "too little sleep."

If women who have to work for farm hands, if women who carry heavy housework year in and year out, would deliberately make up their minds to take a midday nap, they would find in the long run that they could do more and better work, and come out of heated work with better nerve, than if they tried to work every minute of the day. The few minutes of daylight sleep will come back laden with manifold riches of strength. It is useless for a woman to say she cannot sleep in daytime. If any one will lie down quietly and close the eyes one-half hour per day, at the same time every day for two weeks, there will be no trouble about not being able to sleep in daytime. For many people the half-hour per day is sufficient rest to help keep good strength all day. The sleep at night will be all the better for it, because the nerves will not be so worn and tired as to make one restless.

No one can make a rule that will apply to one as to the proper amount of sleep necessary; but one thing is sure—any woman had better err on the side of too much sleep, than run any risk as to wearing out her nerves, which work on too little sleep is sure to do.

Children, too, are sometimes abused by those who love them best by being obliged to get up to breakfast whether their sleep is "out" or not. They will wake up of their own accord when they have slept enough.

We women do too much work in many directions. We sew too much, we (some of us) scrub to much, and many a one cleans for hard hours at a time when a very few minutes of care-taking would have prevented the necessity for the cleaning.

If we would take a nap in the midst of the day, and by forethought save the time from unnecessary work, we might live longer to do work. One frail, delicate woman, who has been able all her life to keep her home pleasant and her five children happy, thinks her success all due to the fact that she sleeps twenty minutes every afternoon; her nerves are rested, her body and mind refreshed, and her strength renewed, so that she does not become overtired before night. She began the habit when she first began to keep house, and learned to always take the time for it because it was economy in the end.

We hear much about woman's rights, but no woman uses all the rights that are accorded her unless she makes of herself physically the young woman she has a right to be, then increases her mental strength to what it should and can become. When the majority of women do there will be no question as to the status she will have in the home, the neighborhood and the nation.

If more home mothers will sleep more they will be stronger women for all duties that come. Then don't let any one feel that the person who takes an every-day nap is wasting time, but rather let it become "the proper thing to do." Let every woman feel amount of sleep for every day that Summer brings, as it is her duty to fill her days with earnest labor.

Many of us can "bless the man who first invented sleep," but we do not take our full blessing, and while we gain a little time we waste strength, forgetting that our time will some day give out.

Let the women of the land have more sleep, and we shall hear less complaint of the miseries of hot weather.—Mrs Kedzie, in Philadelphia Press.

Training a Bull-Dog.

From the Detroit Free Press.

A hard-looking citizen, with a ferocious white bull-dog attached to a chain, attracted a good deal of attention on the front end of a Fort street car. The dog's legs and body were covered with an inch of mud, and he trotted alongside the moving car, tugging at his chain, it took all the owner's strength to hold him.

"Where are you going with the dog?" was asked.

"Nowhere," replied the man; "only working him."

"Got a match for him?"

"Yes; comes off next Saturday night in Delray. He's in pretty good shape and I guess he's a winner. A street car is the best place in the world to work a dog on. If you can run him under a buggy his throat gets full of mud from the horse's feet. A tread-mill is no use, because it worries the heart out of him. But a street car takes the cake, and especially this line, because you can ride twelve miles for a nickel. A man can reduce a dog at the rate of three pounds a day by running him alongside a street car."

The Locusts in Literature.

In these later years of the Nineteenth century "everybody writes;" and from the fashionable lady who cannot spell to the tight rope dancer who dictates his "Impression from an Altitude" any one who has any grain of vanity, or shred of adventure, embodies his or her ideas or recollections in an article for a periodical or a volume for the circulating libraries. Whether a physician becomes illustrious through a patient's death; or a comic singer has pleased a London or Paris audience, whether an artist has painted a ginshop, or a sculptor has carved a clown, whether a general has won a battle, a clergyman has been imprisoned by his bishop, or a lady been distinguished in a divorce suit, one and all of these will forthwith publish something, article, monograph, novelette, essay, reminiscence, or the letters of somebody else, without the slightest regard to whether they possess any literary capabilities for the work or not. If the public has ever heard of them in any capacity, whether marching through a savage country or singing a music hall ditty, whether speaking at a public meeting or rebutting a criminal charge in the dock, they will all write, and they will all find editors, publishers, and publics ready to receive them.

A war may become impossible through all nations being armed to the teeth; it may also prove in the future that writing and publishing what is written will become so general that it will cease altogether. Other methods than those now used may most likely supersede printing; but, whatever the practial means pursued in the future to perpetuate and generalize human thought, it is certain that, if the "making of books" (or their equivalents) continues to increase at the rate at which it has increased in last twenty years it will become so frightful a burden, so sickly a plague, that it will cease to have any life or meaning in it, as a locust swarm perishes of famine from its multitude.—Ouida.

Walking Lovers.

Washington Corr. Philadelphia Record.

Lovers who cannot get married for one reason or another, usually not entirely disconnected with money questions, are found in every town. But it seems to me that there are more known cases of this sad sort of living in Washington than in any other city. "Walking lovers" they are commonly called, because in many instances they can only meet on the street. Stern parents or gossiping companions make it impracticable or unpleasant to meet in the usual way at the girl's home, and so they go strolling along the streets or through the parks amid the universal sympathy of so much of the world as loves a lover.

The half hour at noon which most of the departments give to the employes for lunching purposes is the time when most of these old lovers walk, for many of them are in the departments and cannot afford to surrender a salary by marrying. Some of them have been walking through the lunch hour thus hopelessly for years. There is no probability that they will ever get married. But there is nothing to prevent their walking up and down together. Now and then, however, one of these couples whom we have seen among the walking lovers for years either gets some windfall from fortune's tree or gets desperate—in either event getting married. Then we all congratulate them in our hearts, whether we have ever been introduced to them or not, for we feel that they are old friends with whom we do well to rejoice.

The Maiden Lady Was Startled.

An amusing story comes to me of a well-known artist in this city who is afflicted with a maiden aunt of uncertain age. This venerable lady has a knack of changing her boarding house about once a month, and on these occasions she invariably desires the attendance of her nephew to assist in packing and moving. At length the nephew became irritable at the loss of time and temper consequent upon these peregrinations, and on receiving the usual monthly summons decided on dispatching his stalwart Irish model, Mike, to his aunt's aid.

"Mike," said he, "go up to this address at once; the lady has something for you to do."

"Roight, sorr," replied Mike, who had no idea but that he was going to pose for a lady artist. In due time Mike presented himself at the house.

"Oh my nephew has sent you, has he? Well, what do you charge?"

"Well, mum," answered the son of Erin, "my price is fifty cents an hour draped, and a dollar an hour nude!"

The artist's name no longer figures in the old lady's will, nor have any assurances on his part made her believe that anything but a deliberate insult was intended.—St. Louis Critic.

A Tragic-comic Romance.

Paris Dispatch to the London Telegraph.

A stripling of 17, residing with his parents at Buda-Pesth, Hungary, fell in love with a girl three years his junior, and these children were in such despair at the prospect of having to wait so long before they could be married that they decided to commit suicide. Their last meeting was behind the Custom-house. Tears were shed on either side, and some kissing and hugging was gone through. The juvenile couple then repaired to the Danube, and with a fortitude worthy of a better cause the young lady jumped in. Fortunately she could swim, and availed herself fully of her capabilities in that art. She shrieked for "help," which was soon at hand. Just as she was safely landed her lover fired three revolver shots against himself, but none of them took effect, and a quarter of an hour later the young folks were handed over to their respective parents.

THE CONQUEROR CONQUERED.

In southern archipelagoes he'd fought the bloody cannibal;
He'd skinned and tanned the crocodile and found him very tannable,
Not a word of fear he'd uttered, not a word and not a syllable.
When he killed the Bengal tiger, and he found him very killable.

He claimed his strength was very great, for bears and lions suitable;
He used to boot the grizzly bear and found him very bootable;
He claimed in killing monstrous snakes that he was very capable.
No boa constrictor could escape, for he was unescapable.

In fighting hippopotami, he said he was invincible.
No jaguar could make him wince, because he wasn't winceable;
He made the ramping elephant no longer recognizable;
And pulverized the roaring bull, and found him pulverizable.

Just then his wife came in and said," "I'd think it quite commendable,
If you'd come and 'tend the baby, and you'll find him very tendable."
The way she took him by the ear will make this poem readable;
She pulled him out and lead him home, and found him very leadable.

LOVE'S STRATAGEM.

Lieut. Marshall clanked into his diminutive quarters helmeted and sworded.

"Hail, guardian of the fort!" cried Mrs. Marshall, looking up from the perusal of a letter from home. "Did you have a very horrible night?"

"So, so."

These nights on guard were always horrible in Mrs. Marshall's mind, and so unnecessary, she grumbled, in piping times of peace. No Indians within five hundred miles; no labor riots. She did not believe in works of supererogation.

Marshall was saying, "In time of peace prepare for war," sleepily, when an orderly rapped. "Hullo! here's active service for you"—reading the paper handed in by the orderly. Betty came and read over her husband's shoulder. "I am not sure that I like this kind of police duty, however,"

"'August twentieth.' That's to-morrow, Tom. 'An escort of ten men. To pursue and arrest and bring back to jail in Green River Jas. O'Leary.' What does it all mean?"

"O'Leary is the fellow who broke into Jones jewelry store in Green River the other day. He is a desperate character, I hear; escaped from Texas a few months ago, where he was awaiting trial for manslaughter. I wish the Green River people would look after their own rascals. And why should the colonel pitch on me to go? Just off the guard, too, and as seedy as you please."

Betty sympathized with him fully, of course; you might be sure of that. Tom's grievances eased off in that sunshine. He picked himself up presently, and went back to the guard-house to turn over his responsibilities to his immediate successor; then to see the colonel, and glean particulars in regard to the morrow's expedition. It was borne in upon him that the colonel had proposed to compliment him by this detail. "If I can only keep my eyes open," he said to himself, strolling down the line from the colonel's office, gazing at a photograph of the escaped burglar, which had been handed him. Two or three officers were standing on the porch talking to Betty when he came up. He showed the photograph.

"O'Leary, his countenance," said one of these. "Old Jim, they call him, because he was christened John, and because he looks like a babe. If we were in San Antonia now, and you caught him and brought him back to the jail there, the chances are he would be linched. He has a very unenviable reputation down that way. He's been wanted in Texas a long time—wanted badly."

"Who is it he looks like?" Betty wondered.

"One of Raphael's cherubs? No; they're too fat and jolly. A mediæval saint."

"I don't believe he has done all those dreadful things," cried Betty, still gazing.

Tom took the photograph from her and turned to go in-doors, the other young men moving on.

"I have to be off before dark, Betty I take my men into Green river, and start from there with the constable and one or two of his myrmidons."

Betty followed him into the house. "Do get a good sleep, dearest," she said, "and by the time you are about again dinner will be ready."

Tom got off duly, cheered and speeded by his wife and her cook. The latter displayed unusual energy, asking more questions than Mrs. Marshall could answer as to the burglar at large and the efforts being made to capture him. This cook was a young woman of twenty-four or so, of a type that one walking in the beaten path is more apt to find in Bret Harte's novels than in real life. But life as a frontier post is hardly the beaten path. Betty had remarked of her hand-maiden that she might have been brought up anyhow, and come from anywhere, and done anything. Once, going out suddenly into the kitchen, she discovered the cook mounted on a table singing a variety theater ditty, with appropriate gestures, to two other neighboring cooks and an enlisted man or two. There was a racy abandon about this performance which suggested to Mrs. Marshall that the singer was at home behind the foot-lights.

"It makes me creep," Betty told Tom, "to think how she has probably been knocked about the world. Her father was a miner, and she was brought up in that kind of atmosphere—excitement, false hopes, and disappointment.

"Married, I dare say," supplemented Tom. "And put a bullet through the fellow's head, and then has taken up with one or two others."

"Yes, yes." Betty dropped her voice to an awe-struck whisper. "She actually showed me the photograph of a friend of hers who she said was 'in' for five years—in (such a dreadful word!) for bigamy. In prison at Leavenworth."

"Why don't you get rid of her?" cried Tom, briskly. "She's a beastly cook; I know that."

But in spite of her questionable antecedents the mistress' heart went out to the maid with the same instinct which had prompted her at the east to visit dingy tenement-houses and pauper wards in hospitals. There was a responsiveness, an affectionateness, about the cook to the attraction of which Betty succumbed. Besides, the girl was pretty, with a slender rounded figure, and brilliantly bright hazel eyes, a fair, pure skin and soft golden brown hair. These charms increased after she had lived a decent quiet life with the Marshalls or two or three months, and a certain haggard look disappeared.

To be sure, she had been a little off her head for the last week or so. She had looked in the morning as though she had not closed her eyes the night before; she had returned to a former habit, which had yielded to Mrs. Marshall's expostulations, of going about until high noon her head tied up. "So fearfully uncheerful," complained Betty. Moreover, she was peevish and fretful. There was altogether an air, unmistakable to the housekeeper, of uncertain tenure of office about her, which struck a chill to Betty's heart. This young lady was as wedded to present ways as a cat. All change had a vague element of terror for her.

Hence it was with a sense of relief that she remarked that her Mary was aroused from her apathy and indifference by the fact of Lieut. Marshall's unexpected orders. She was as communicative as possible, pleased at having hit upon a subject of interest. Still she kept recurring to the strong impression that Mary was an odd creature. She had forgotten something, and went back to the kitchen unexpectedly. There stood Mary in the middle of the room, her clenched slender fist pressed against her temples, her bright dark eyes gazing out before her with fixed intensity of concentration; poised on her small arched feet as though about to spring; she suggested an alert, trapped creature at bay. What an untamed, problematical girl, and what a mixed civilization had produced her! Meantime all well-balanced house-keepers will agree that Mrs. Marshall was most unfortunate in having such an unsuitable cook, were she ever so devoted to the regeneration of humanity.

Dusk was gathering about the post when Mrs. Marshall betook herself to the front door and looked up and down the line of quarters and across the parade-ground and wished for Tom. A man came rapidly down the plank walk, paused, and addressed her.

"Does Mrs. Escadero live here?"

It was a second before Betty remembered that that was the elegant name of her cook." "Yes, the does."

"Can I see her? I'm a brother of hers."

Betty looked up with pleased interest. A lamp was lighted near by at the moment, and brought out the slender features and fair hair of her complection's striking face, and which was also strikingly like Mary's. He seemed quite a boy; younger than Mary; or perhaps it was the expression. He had a quick, bright, boyish smile that flashed upon Betty before he moved into the shadows of the porch.

"I will call your sister, or you can look her up yourself if you choose. Through that gate; the kitchen is at the end of the yard. You will find her there."

"Thank you, ma'am," said the young fellow, and disappeared through the gate.

Afterward some friends came in, and there was a game of whist, a frugal, impromptu supper followed. A friend offered to stay all night if Betty was nervous at being left alone; but this she rejected and scorned the notion of fear. Nor was she in the least afraid; it was part of her creed that a soldier's wife should have a stout heart. She made a pretense of closing doors and windows for the night, saying all the while in her heart that it was a waste of strength to take these precautions in a place so carefully parolled. Finally she went out into the kitchen to say a last word to Mary. She found the kitchen deserted. A lamp was burning high, the flame blown about in a draught from the open door. She closed the door and looked about her. Another door led upstairs to a loft adjoining her own room; it occurred to her to shoot the bolt, which was on the outside. Some one might slip in and up while Mary is out." On her way upstairs she laughed at herself for having done this. How silly of her the bolt could be slipped back again in a moment. Once in her room, it occurred to her that the door leading from her room into the garret was the one to make fast. But on examination it proved to have no fastenings.

She heard Mary come to the room she occupied at the head of the stairs presently, hesitate, then go into her room, but without closing the door.

"That is nice of Mary," reflected the little mistess. "She thinks I am afraid," And she smiled to herself at the notion.

Still, for all she could not sleep. She tossed restlessly for awhile, half lost herself in troubled dreams, sat in bed broad-awake, and longed for day. "Goodness me its a mouse!" she thought, hearing subdued, annoying noises in the adjoining attic. "I wish it were the cat."

The gray dawn reassured her. The night's mysteries were vanished; familiar objects in her room assumed distinctness; speculation no longer lurked in corners. She closed her eyes and slept.

She awoke suddenly. Her bed was drawn close to the door of the attic aforesaid. That door had been opened very softly, but it had jarred the bed. A figure stood holding the door, closing it very gently—a man's figure, slight, fair hair. She saw so much, then closed her eyes in an instinct of self-preservation, but not before she had recognized the man who had asked for Mrs. Escadero the night before. He wore a soft felt hat, as he had done then, and he carried his boots in one hand. He had evidently spent the night in the loft, after being stowed away there by his sister. Betty, in fact, had locked him in, and Mary had come up to her room without noticing the shot bolt. All this flashed across Mrs. Marshall in a second, as also his extraordinary likeness to her cook, which to be sure, she had remarked the night before. It was one of those all-over likenesses, attitude, action, expression—unmistakable.

Betty did not stir. The man's hope was to slip through the room without rousing her; and if she was feigning, as his sharpened senses may have guessed, it suited his purpose to accept this situation. He had weighed his chances, and this was the best his only one. His sister had given him the geography of the house the night before, and he had rapidly decided to come this way on discovering awhile ago that egress below was barried. He stealthily crossed the room, found his sister (she was his sister) sitting up wide-eyed in bed, as alert as he, as quick to comprehend what had happened; ready, in pursuance of a precious plan, to help him put on a suit of her clothes, including an ulster, and to dress herself in the gray clothes he wore. Not a word was uttered meanwhile. It might have been Mary only, rising betimes and stiring about as she made ready to begin her day's work. In fact, as Mrs. Marshall lay there, she wondered in the whirl of her excited, startled brain, weary too with night's sleeplessness, whether she had not dreamed that a slight, fair man had stood a second at her bed-side on his way through her room.

No, it had been no dream. The pair went down-stairs presently, and out of the front door. Then Betty rushed to the window in time to see them—a man and a woman—cross the parade-ground, making for the little railroad station, which lay just outside the post.

"She is taking him to the cars; he is in some trouble," Betty decided. "Just what might be expected from that wild west creature. What an extraordinary resemblance between them! Poor soul! I hope she will get him off."

She was all for defeating the ends of justice in her sympathy for her attractive cook. She had a distinct impression that the latter numbered jail-birds of all kinds among her friends; this was probably one of them. Still, she hoped he would get off.

They just made the train. Betty stood by the window shivering in her night-dress, and heard the whistle shrill, and saw the cars sweep up and linger an instant, and then sweep on again. She watched next to see Mary come back across the parade-ground. She would come in quietly and go about her work as though nothing had occurred. Her mistress would make no sign; in truth, her strongest feeling was sympathy and pity. She did wish that Mary had given her her confidence; she need not have smuggled her brother in and out in that way. But, again, it would never have done to tell if the man was a fugitive from justice. Poor soul! poor soul! This accounted for her despairing looks yesterday.

But how long she was getting back! Mrs. Marshal went back to bed again presently, and, tired out, dozed off to sleep, and slept an hour in spite of herself. She awoke suddenly, recalled the events of the past night, and pulled herself together. Nine o'clock. She would get up and dress.

She hurried through her toilette, somewhat spurred by a vague misgiving. When she went down-stairs she found the house quite deserted, save for the soldier who worked about the house, and was known as their striker, and who on this occasion had kindled the kitchen fire, and was now standing around that apartment awaiting farther developments.

"Cook deserted?" he inquired, easily. Such desertions were common enough in that region. "Seen her git aboard the train this mornin'. Said she was tired of working. Had her brother along. Her twin, she said. Like as two peas in a pod."

So the fact of Mary's departure was established. Mrs. Marshall made the best of it; made herself some coffee, went into Green river in the mid-day ambulance, secured another servant, whom she brought back with her, and congratulatrd herself that Tom had been out of the way during this domestic flury. "Especially during last night's occupation." It did not occur to her that if Tom had not gone, Mary's brother would not have come.

That day went by. At the middle of the next one Tom returned.

"Did you catch the burglar?" his wife asked, after a joyful welcome.

"No; he got away from us. I see you've replaced your Prairie Rose," nodding in the direction of the Irish girl who was laying the lunch-table in the next room. "I brought her back with me all the same—as far as Green river, that is."

"What do you mean?"

"That the governor of this territory has retained Mary Escadero as a witness in the case of the state versus James O'Leary. They turn out to be brother and sister."

Mrs. Marshall stared at her husband in a dazed way. Then the whole thing began to dawn upon her. "Oh, Tom!" She rapidly sketched her adventures during his absence.

"By jingo! you are a plucky little soul! No screaming? no fainting? no hysterics? But, you poor little chicken, it was pretty rough on you."

Betty scorned these compliments. "I was not afraid in the least. I was excited and over-wrought and absorbed in the situation. It did not dawn upon me who the man was. I should have turned to stone if I had dreamed it was O'Leary standing over me." And she shuddered. "When I watched Mary walk across the parade ground with him, my idea was that he had done something, of course—stolen a horse, or forged, or—"

"Some trifle of that sort. But now for my story."

He had tramped over the prairies with his escort for hours before coming upon a trace of the man he was looking for. These wanderings had brought him to a part of the country crossed by the railroad that skirted the post and near a river. It was a rolling country, so that the view was broken between short given points. The scouting party separated in order to command the whole field. All at once one of the soldiers saw a boat put off from the shore and gain mid-stream with a few rapid strokes; a woman held the oars. At the same time a man clamored back up the steep river bank, having first pushed the boat off; the bank was very steep, and had probably concealed the party of soldiers from his view. Having gained the top, he paused to recover breath, then in full view of Lieutenant Marshall, who instantly identified him with the object of his search. He signaled to his men and they had surrounded and captured O'Leary, or so they thought, in a twinkling.

Their prisoner made little or no resistance. He started to run at first to be sure, but after giving one rabid anxious glance across the river, where his companion had landed, and where she was speedily lost to sight behind the high bank and rolling hillocks on that side, he submitted to the inevitable and to be captured.

It was not until they were all back again in Green River that it was discovered that they were not bringing back O'Leary at all, but his sister, Mary Escadero, the Marshalls' cook. And by that time O'Leary himself was in safety, far enough away.

"Recognize her? Not I," said Tom. "I recognized him from the photograph I had with me. I believe it did cross my mind that my prisoner resembled your Prairie Rose; but I merely regarded it as a confidence. She says they are twins. It's an odd thing now that a precious rascal like that should be able to inspire such devotion. I declare to you, Betty, I don't believe that woman had a thought of herself in the matter."

And Betty, having the lukewarm attachments and feeble friendships and changing loves of respectable people, felt a stir at the heart as she remembered that from the beginning outcasts have passed into the kingdom of heaven, whose name is also Love. The sins of these wild O'Learys or Escaderos, or whatever their name might be, were many, no doubt. Please God! there was a balance in their favor, kept by a merciful recording angel.—Harper's Bazar.

A West Virginia Diana.

The most celebrated hunters of the section are Bob Eastman, Jule Baker, a woman, and Louis Chidester. There is a law to protect deer, but it is not observed. Out of season venison is called mountain mutton. Jule Baker is the wife of Joan Baker, and lives near the mouth of Black Water fork. She can handle a Winchester with the dexterity and precision of Old Leatherstocking, and hundreds of deer and bear have fallen victims to the unerring bullets from her rifle. Bob Eastman says he saw her plunging down the mountain side through six inches of snow one day, with two rifles and a bear trap strapped to her back and followed by six dogs. She ran three miles to a point where she thought a deer in full-chase would cross, and she got there in time to see her husband kill him. She is a big black haired woman, very industrious, with a heart as large as a foot, and she is the mother of seven children. She is not pretty. A few months ago, far a silver dollar, she carried a valise weighing over 100 pounds seven miles for an engineer. It is said that on one occasion she carried a sewing machine from Grafton to her home, a distance of sixty miles.—Baltimore American.

One Way of Paying a Debt.

A foreign journal tells the following story: Not long ago a certain pacha of exhalted position borrowed a sum of money from a Frenchman, and when the time for repayment came he was unable to raise the required amount. "But," said he, "I cannot give you money, for I have none, I can at least give you a lucrative post—namely, the repairing of the tombs of the sultans, which are in a bad state, and you can remove those old tiles which are not cared for, and replace them by modern ones made in France." Needless to say this post was willingly accepted, and on setting to work the delighted Frenchman discovered in a vault of one of the tombs, a whole heap of ancient titles, which provident Turks of a bygone age had put there with a view to restoration, but of the existence of which the Turks of this generation were ignorant. Endless cases of valuable titles were thus collected and dispatched to France, and when it was found absolutely necessary to make restoration, cheap new titles from France were put up, and thus did the French creditor make over and over again the sum of money he advanced to the pacha.

Belgium Will Have no Portias.

From the St. James' Gazette.

We regret to see that the Belgian court has decided that Mlle. Popelin cannot be admitted to the bar. The judges took the old stereotyped ground—namely, that woman has other social duties to perform, and that the law and customs of the country did not allow a woman to exercise the profession of a barrister. The right of "the law and the customs of the country" to decide what are the social duties of any particular facts of the community is an act of usurpation which is indefensible. The Career open to all talents is a formula which should not be limited by the sex of those who possess the talents. "The tools to him who can use them"—or to her—and if women can plead effectually at the bar, why in the name of goodness should they not do so?

Perhaps the most curious battalion in the army is the Norwegian corps of skaters. These corps are composed of picked armed men with rifles, which they use with great precision. The skates used are admirably adapted for traveling over rough or broken ice and frozen snow, being six inches broad and between nine and ten inches long. The soldiers can be manuœvred upon the ice or over the snow fields to the mountains with a rapidity equal to that of the best trained cavalry. As an instance of the speed they attained, it is stated that a messenger attached to the corps has accomplished 120 miles in 18½ hours over a mountainous country.

Mr. Gladstone walked down to the House of Commons one afternoon enveloped after his wont, in a thick, dark cloak. Behind him, at a distance of a few yards, walked the Conservative member in question. When near St Stephen's, the Conservative member observed that a man stepped forward and said something in the ear of the Liberal leader. Mr. Gladstone threw his head in the air and walked on, while the man looked after him with a satisfied expression. The Conservative member's curiosity was awakened, and he went up to the man. "What did you say to Mr Gladstone?" he said. "Oh," was the reply, "I only told him he was a ——old scoundrel!"

"Cat" Inspection.

According to The Hospital, it was a stroke of genius to find an occupation in life for the laziest exquisities among the domestic animals. The happy inspiration came to a gentleman, who had reason to suspect that his house drains were defective.

He threw the entire establishment open to the inspection of his cat, and then poured a strong infusion of valerian into the pipes. The plot succeeded to a marvel. Puss, who is as fond of perfumeries as any client of Mr. Rimmel's, soon discovered three leaks, at each of which she established her self in turn, to enjoy the pungent odor at her leisure.

Thus not only were the householder's suspicions confirmed, but actual situation of the leaks was revealed as accurately as if they had been indicated by a sanitary inspector.

Fiendish Methods in War.

From a London Letter.

I am told that a new shell, segmental, and with a compound of metals in its forward part, including a metal which will fuse with the explosion or the heat of impact, and scald anybody within reach, has been invented, and is about to be submitted to the military authorities. It is said to be American, but nothing much appears to be known of it, and up till the present it has not been patented. We prohibit the use of explosive bullets, but there does not seem to be any limit to the diabolical nature of the inventions in shell.

MRS. TRIPP'S CHINA.

When good old Mr. and Mrs. Tripp died within a week of each other, there was, I regret to say, an immediate disagreement among their heirs over the small property left by the old people.

Such disagreements ar so shamefully common now, that this one might not have excited any particular interest had it not been for the some what peculiar nature of the article over which the cupidity of the various heirs had asserted itself.

Few, indeed, were the possessions Mr. and Mrs. Tripp left behind them. They did not own even the humble little brown house in which they had lived for the past ten years, and when their funeral expenses had been paid, there was not a dollar left of the sum found in an old pewter teapot on the top shelf of the red cupboard in the kitchen. Frugal as they had been, it was evident that this sum represented the sum total of their savings of many years.

But Mr. and Mrs. Tripp had not always been so poor as they were at the last, and there was one of Mrs. Tripp's possession which she had always exhibited with pride as a relic of her better days, and as undeniable proof of the fact that there had been a time when she "had had a plenty."

Over this her relatives now disputed What was it? Only a white china tea-set, each piece of which had a broad gold band around the rim.

"It's pure chany," Mrs. Tripp would often say, with a thrill of pride, as she held a saucer or a plate before the eyes of her visitors. "See how thin it is; you kin look right through it. Solomon give it to me on our tenth wedding day. He was in the grocery buisuess then, an' doin' well, an' he'd gone to New York to buy goods; an' when he come home, he brung this all packed so carefully in straw, that tho' wa'n't a piece broke; but one of the sass dishes was cracked a little, an' I never used it none, so it aint never broke, either. I think the world an' all of my chany."

The dearly prized "chany" had for years graced an old-fashioned "whatnot" in a corner of Mr. Tripp's best room. There was nothing else on the whatnot but two big "chany" dogs, one a reddish brown, and the other a dark blue, which looked as though they felt themselves responsible for the safety of the dishes, and intended being faithful to their trust.

Mr. and Mrs. Tripp had no children, but they had some relatives—cousins and a second-cousins and more remote connections. These relatives were numerous, however. Just how numerous they were was made manifest when it came to dividing the few personal belongings of the old people.

The "heirs', met at the house on their way home from the funeral. Hardly were they assembled, when Nancy Johnson, own cousin to Mrs. Tripp, said:

"Of course you all know that my father and Betty Tripp's mother was own brother and sister, and that made me and Betty own cousins. So it seems only fair that I should at least have my choice of her things, 'speshly when I might claim 'em all; but I aint one to act selfish, and I'm willin' you should all have your sheer of what's left after I've packed up Betty's chany tea-set and"—

"I knowed that was what you was goin' to say," interrupted Mrs. Cephas King, "and I can tell you that Solomon Tripp was my own cousin, and the tea things was as much his as they was Betty's, and I've as much right to 'em as you have!"

A thin, sharp voice came from a corner of the room.

"Betty Tripp told me agin and agin," it said, "that she wanted me to have them dishes, when she was done with em' She said"—

"She told me the same thing!" interposed Mrs. Cyrus Masterson, who who was only a third-cousin."

"I took more care of her endurin'. her last sickness that anybody else!" interrupted second-cousin Beulah Hovey, "and one day we was talkin' 'bout the chany, an' Betty says, says she, 'Beulah,' says she, ''bout that chany tea-set,' says she, 'I'd as leave you had it as any one, an' a little leaver.'"

"Them's the very words she said to my wife!" put in Mr. Ezra Simmons, a little old man with a feminine face and voice, "an' Betty was a own cousin of mine."

"And of mine!" said a tall woman in rusty black near the whatnot on which the coveted china stood.

So the strife continued, until there was no posibility of an amicable adjustment of the claims of various claimants. They finally left the house and the china in the possession of Miss Selina Sharpe, a lady of about fifty years, who, although an own cousin of Mr. Tripp. had put forward no claim to the china, declaring that she had no wish to possess it.

"But there's one thing certain," said Miss Sharpe, as she closed the door behind the last of the "heirs," "there shan't one of 'em step their foot into this house agin to touch the chany or anything else, until it's settled by law who has a right to em. I've rented the house myself of its owner, and I won't have my doors darkened by any of them."

Miss Sharpe adhered to this resolution, politely but firmly refusing admittance to several of the claimants who called during the following week, "to talk it over" with her, and, possibly, to carry the china home in triumph.

Beside the china, there was nothing among Mr. and Mrs. Tripp's few poor belongings that the relatives coveted, all of the furniture of any value having been sold or given in payment of a few bills that came in after the funeral. Accordingly, Miss Sharpe was soon left in undisturbed possession of what was left, and the china, guarded by the faithful dogs, still rested on the old walnut whatnot three weeks after the couple, to whom it had given pleasure, had been laid away in the little cemetery behind the village church.

Mrs. Cephas King and Nancy Johnson had been next-door neighbors and very warm friends up to the time the dispute over the china arose; but now, alas! they scornfully passed by without a word or smile of of recognition when they met, and the King children were forbidden to have anything at all to do with the Johnson children.

Mr. Cyrus Masterson lived directly across the street from Beulah Hovey, and so frequent had been the friendly, pleasant little calls the ladies had made upon each other that a smoothly worn path led from one house to the other. Now all was changed. The path was wholly disused, and Mrs. Masterson gathered up her skirts when she met Mrs. Hovey on the street, lest they should suffer contamination by coming into contact with those her beloved neighbor.

Mrs. Ezra Simmons returned a certain basque pattern she had borrowed of Selina Sharpe with a note stating that in "consequence of the course you have seen fit to pursoo in relations to my husband's own dear dead cuzzen's chiny tea-things, which now rightfully belongs to Me, I return the inclosed bask pattern and would thank you for my cup cake reseet and my polynay pattern, not desiring that anything of yours should remain in my possession and visa versy, and that we do not speak from this date.

So it was that there was discord and enmity where there had once been peace and harmony. Not one of the contending claimants condescended to speak to any of her rivals to the inheritance.

A month had passed, and the bad feeling was at its height, when Mr. and Mrs. Ezra Simmons one evening concluded to spend an hour with their friends, Mr. and Mrs. Drewe. The deacon and his wife were not at home when Mr. and Mrs. Simmons arrived, but Sally, the maid-servant, said that she was expecting them every moment, and invited the callers to wait until their return.

They had waited in the parlor a few moments when the bell rang and Sally was heard to tell other callers that her master and mistress would be in very soon and to invited them also to come in and wait. Directly afterward Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus Masterson were ushered in. Seeing the Simmonses, the new-comers haughtily withdrew to a corner of the parlor and sat down in silence.

A third ring of the bell and Mrs. Beulah Hovey appeared at the parlor door. She gave the previous occupants of the parlor a stony stare and then went to sit stiffly erect in the centre of a sofa, where she seemed to be engaged in studing intently the pattern of the paper on the wall.

Perfect silence ensued for a moment when the bell again rang and Nancy Johnson's voice was heard at the door. When Mr. and Mrs. Drewe followed all these callers into the parlor, strange as it may seem, they had with them Mrs. Cephas King, who was too courageous a woman to be in the least daunted by what she beheld. She calmly seated herself in a comfortable rocking-chair and composedly returned Mrs. Nancy Johnson's stare.

While Mr. and Mrs. Drewe were vainly endeavoring to start a general conversation, the village fire-bell rang for the first time in many months. The fire-company consisted of those who could be first in getting to a small room in the rear of the post-office, where there were six fire-extinquishers and a hand reel and hose.

The entire population of the village was in the street in less than five minutes after the first sounding of the bell, and it was soon known that the fire was in the little brown house lately occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Tripp, but now in the possession of Miss Selina Sharpe.

The first comers found the present tenant of the cottage flying wildly around, throwing her few belongings into the street and screaming "Fire!" at the top of her voice.

When the occupants of Mr. Drewe's parlor reached the cottage they found the roof in flames and smoke pouring from the windows while the fire company was still in the distance.

"Has my chany been got out yet?" shrieked Nancy Johnson.

"Your chany!" said Cyrilla Mills, who was only a fourth-cousin.

"I'd say 'my chany,'" said Beulah Hovey.

"It won't be anybody's if it aint got out o' there right off!" shrieked Ezra Simmons.

At that instant the men appeared in the smoking doorway trying to balance the whatnot and its contents between them. The blue dog toppled over and fell to pieces on the stone step as they reached the door. The brown one threatened to do the same, and the cups and other dishes were swaying unsteadily from side to side.

"Be careful of my dishes!" cried Mrs. Mills.

"Your—on!"

"Oh!"

"O-o-o-h!"

"If that aint too bad!"

One of the men had stepped off the little porch sooner than the other, thus tilting the whatnot forward and sending every piece of the cherished china down with a crash on the brick walk before the door.

The several heirs looked at each other in silence for a moment. Then Beulah Hovey suddenly cried out, with an hysterical little laugh: "Well, what geese we be!"

"So we air, Beuly, so we air," acquiesced Ezra Simmons. "I'd never have made any fuss about the old chany only for Emmeline making me do it!"

This frank confession of the ascendency of Mrs. Simmons created a laugh, in which every one joined.

There were several waggish fellows in the crowd who turned the occasion into one of such merriment that even grim Mrs. Johnson was found chuckling half-aloud, while Thyrza Masterson and Mrs. Simmons, being at heart good-natured and keenly susceptible to even poor wit, laughed louder than any one else, and walked home together side by side in the most amicable manner. That was the end of all ill-feeling over the china as well as the end of the china itself. —Youth's Companion.

Things Worth Knowing.

1. That fish may be scaled much easier by dipping into boiling water about a minute.

2. That fish may as well be scaled if desired before packing down in salt, though in that case do not scald them.

3. Salt fish are quickest and best freshened by soaking in sour milk.

4. That milk which is turned or changed may be sweetened and rendered fit for use again by stirring in a little soda.

5. That salt will curdle new milk, hence in preparing milk porridge, gravies, &c., the salt should not be added until the dish is prepared.

6. That fresh meat after beginning to sour, will sweeten if placed out of doors in the cool of night.

7. That clear boiling water will remove tea stains and fruit stains. Pour the water through the stains and thus prevent it spreading over the fabric.

8. That ripe tomatoes will remove ink and other stains from white cloth; also from the hands.

9. That a tablespoonful of turpentine boiled with your clothes will aid in the whitening process.

10. That boiled starch is much improved by the addition of a little sperm or a little salt, or a little gum arabic dissolved.

11. That beeswax and salt will make your rusty flat irons as clean and smooth as glass. Tie a lump of wax in a rag and keep it for that purpose. When the irons are hot, rub them first with the wax rag, then scour with a paper or cloth sprinkled with salt.

12. That blue ointment and kerosene mixed in equal proportions and applied to the bedsteads is an unfailing bedbug remedy, and that a coat of whitewash is ditto for the walls of a log house.

13. That kerosene will soften boots or shoes that have been hardened by water and render them as pliable as new.

14. That kerosene will make tin tea kettles as bright as new. Saturate a woolen rag and rub with it. It will also remove stains from the clean varnished furniture.

15. That cool rainwater and soda will remove grease from washable fabric.

How a Paper Hanger Removes old Paper.

Early in the morning the paper hanger and three assistants came in, each with a whitewash brush and a bucket of boiling water. "This is the first move," he said, as they sat down their buckets and began going over walls with the brush and hot water, as though they were whitewashing. In a very short time the four dirty walls were very wet; then the ceiling went through the same course, and when it was thoroughly wet they began peeling off the paper where they first begun to wet it. It came like strips of bark from an easy-peeling log. When a spot seemed not to come off easily it was again wet, and left while they worked at another part. They soon had it all off. In making the paste he put a quarter of a pound of cornstarch into a porcelain kettle, mixed it with a small portion of cold water, then added a lump of alum as large as a cherry, then enough boiling water to make a thin paste, boiled it a few moments and removed it. I asked what the alum was for. "To keep mice or moths from destroying the paper around the edges," he said. The paste was put on with a whitewash brush. The first width (after the paste was put on and the lower end folded back so that it was lightly stuck to the edges, with both wrong sides together, so that its weight in lifting it would not tear it) was lifted up and the top edge held in place, while a dry whitewash brush was passed down the centre of it, and when the folded under part was reached it was unfolded and fastened down in this same way. Overhead the only change was that an attendant held one end of the paper while the hanger put it on with the brush. The wall and ceiling were marked with a tape measure and chalk, the depth to be left for bordering, and an accurate measure of length of paper to be cut was made, making it impossible to have it either too long or too short.—Ohio Farmer.

Don't Like Electric Execution.

The Western Electrician defines the position of most newpapers when it says: The daily press, as a whole, has taken a decided stand against that clause of the law providing for the substitution of electricity for the halter in New York State, which forbids the publication of descriptions of executions.

District Attorney Fellows of New York city holds that the provision is unconstitutional. He says: Among those whom the sheriff has a right under the law to invite to witness the execution, there is no reason why newspaper reporters may not be invited. In fact, they probably will be present. If they were not invited what is there to prevent myself or any one present to recite the facts in conversation after the execution is over? To forbid that I should recite the facts would be to forbid free speech. And furthermore, what does a reporter do but recite the facts to half a million readers, instead of to a group of friends. Of course, if an indictment should be found against an editor or a reporter for printing and reporting the execution, I should be compelled to prosecute, but in my opinion the judge would hold the law to be unconstitutional, or at any rate the trial would not result in a conviction."

Railway Construction in 1888.

The Chicago Railway Age, a journal devoted to the railroad interests, has recently published a statement showing the new mileage of track added to the railway system of the country during the past year. This statement shows that contrary to general expectation a remarkable degree of activity was displayed in extending the railway system during the past season.

It had been supposed that the frequent rate wars and the workings of the interstate commerce law would combine to discourage the investment of capital in the creation of new lines, hence the impression became general that the present year would disclose but few additions to our railway system.

The result, however, has proved that these expectations were not well founded, as according to the Railway Age no less than 7,120 miles of road were built during the present year. While this is a much smaller total than last year, still it must be considered large coming after a season of such unusual expansion as characterized 1887.

The Railway Age distributes the increase among the different groups of states as follows:

	Lines.	Miles.
New England and eastern group	53	452
Central northern group	63	1,030
Southern group	96	2,074
Southwestern group	65	1,675
Northwestern group	31	834
Pacific coast group	57	1,055
Totals	365	7,120

According to this compilation the southern group leads all other sections in the increase; showing a gain of 2,074 miles, or nearly 30 per cent of the entire new mileage.

Kansas leads all the other individual states in the extent of the new mileage, and of the southern states Georgia has added most to her existing facilities. This reported increase in the railroad mileage of the country demonstrates several interesting facts. The most important of these is the evidence afforded of the rapid industrial developement of the south, as it is not to be supposed that the large increase of mileage in that section was based on other cause than actual demand for transportation facilities.

The next lesson taught by the increase in the railway mileage is the utter absurdity of the claim that the interstate commerce law would prevent the construction of new lines of railroad. This has been one of the most frequently repeated arguments used by the opponents of this law, which was enacted to meet the necessities of the people. While its working may certainly have checked the building of useless and superfluous additions to existing lines, it has in no instance prevented the construction of roads in localities where an actual demand for increased facilities existed.

While the law as enforced may have cut down dividends on heavily watered stock, it has not worked as an impediment to the volume of general business, nor deprived the roads of any of the usual traffic.

The report of the Railway Age will not, therefore, be pleasing reading to the enemies of the interstate commerce bill, but it will greatly elate the friends of that measure and the people who have been benefited by its workings.—New Orleans Picayune.

He Cured Himself.

Who would ever think that Joe Jefferson was once almost dead with consumption? Certainly no one that has seen him in that likely dance that the curtain falls on the "Cricket on the Hearth." When Joe Jefferson was a young actor playing Asa Trenchard nobody ever thought he would live out his engagement with the company, for he was not only narrow-chested, hollow-eyed, and consumptive, but he had a bad cough and woebegone expression that was pitiful to contemplate. Every body about the stage liked him, and apprehensive of his early demise accorded him every attention conducive to comfort. On the advice of hapless Mr. Macbeth he one day ordered a bottle sale and pill-box bonfire, and cutting loose from a chain of doctors and druggists, lost himself among the highlands of the Hudson, and began at once to get well. Between cold water, outdoor exercise, nine hours of sleep and a diet fit for an abnegated monk, Mr. Jefferson is to-day a fine specimen of physocial and mental vigor.—Boston Advertiser.

How to Shut a Door.

What is worth doing at all is worth doing well. It is a little act to open or shut a door, but read this paragraph and you will see in that "little act" a very large indication of character: Boys and girls will always show to strangers whether they are well-bred and polite or not, by the manner in which they open and shut the door. If they open it with a rush, or if they neglect to shut it, or shut it carelessly or with a slam, they show that they are not well-behaved or polite. You should always open and shut a door gently and carefully.—Standard.

Animals Disappearing.

Fifty years ago the United States was the home of a large number of peculiar wild animals. Unless a national-preserve comes to the rescue very soon, another decade will see them nearly all extinct. The grizzlies are disappearing from the Rockies. Live buffalo are now worth from $500 to $1,000 apiece, which three years ago cost scarcely one-fifth that amount, and they are found almost nowhere but in a corner of Texas and in the Yellowstone Park. The caribou has been hunted almost out of existence. The mountain sheep, the moose, the beaver, the antelope, are all disappearing.

Inasmuch as no man is a prophet in his own country, why would it not be policy for Wiggins to emigrate!—Birmington Leader.

TRADE WITH CENTRAL AMERICA.

A Company Which is to Promote Trade With Spanish American Countries.

The American Export and Trading company is the title of a corporation that proposes, if possible, to revive the commerce of this country. It intends to do a tremendous general commission, export and import business in manufactured and unmanufactured goods and merchandise, between the United States and especially the Spanish American republics, Mexico, Brazil and the West Indies. It is to obtain rights, concessions, contracts and purchases in these countries, and sell the same, or promote subsidiary companies for developing, utilizing and marketing the advantages thus secured. In its prospectus the company declares that the comparatively limited commercial relations which Americans now enjoy with the countries named are due mainly to the fact that a large portion of American merchants and manufacturers know but little concerning them, and, as a rule, have but little practical experience as to the ways. means and methods of reaching native buyers and consumers abroad and securing their patronage. The company is being organized for the express purpose of meeting these requirements, and for developing and increasing American export trade with these countries instead of allowing the bulk of it to be carried on by English, French and German corporations and manufacturers.

Through the medium of experienced, reliable and responsible correspondents and agents who are familiar with the different counties and their people in almost all parts of the globe, and especially in Mexico, Central and South America, the West Indies, China, Japan and Australia, this company will be able to undertake the successful introduction of American goods and procure large orders for the same. The company will open up and develop this trade and will take charge of shipments of goods to foreign countries and insure the payment of collection of bills, will also furnish perfectly reliable and trustworthy information in regard to the laws, customs, duties, shipping regulations, names of reliable bankers, merchants, lawyers, professional men and others in the countries named.—New York Press.

Barnum's Temperance Lecture.

"I drank," says P. T. Barnum, "more or less intoxicating liquors from 1837 to 1847. The last four of these years I was in England, and there the habit and my appetite for liquor grew so strong from month to month that I discovered that if continued it would certainly work my ruin. With tremendous effort and a most determined resolution I broke the habit square off, and resolved never to practice it again. I have religiously kept that resolution for more than forty years. Had I not done so I should have been in my grave a quarter of a century ago, for my health had already begun to be affected by alcohol. I was so delighted with my own escape that I traveled thousands of miles on my own expense and gave hundreds of free temperance lectures in every state between Maine and Wisconsin, besides Missouri, Kentucky, Louisiana and California. I have gladly expended thousands of dollars for temperance. I have built numerous houses for moderate drinking workingmen on condition that they would become teetotalers, and they subsequently paid for the house with the money and extra strength gained thereby."—Exchange.

About Swearing Off.

A great deal of sport is now made of New Year's Day as a "swearing off time." It is not uncommon to hear the question put in a sarcastic way: "Well, have you swore off yet?" The witty fellows on the newspapers take it up and grind out innumerable jokes about weak-minded men who "turn over a new leaf" on New Year, and turn back to it again in less than a fortnight. But, with all this fun and ridicule, the fact remains that the beginning of a new year is a most fitting time to leave off bad habits, to resolve to profit by mistakes and follies of the past, and to go through the new year better than you did the old one.

So pay no attention to the current gibes and jeers at the custom of "swearing off on the New Year;" and if you see mistakes and follies that you desire to abondon and to leave forever behind, now is the time to do it. The fact is, you should have done so long ago. One can begin a reform in his own habits at any time, and sdould never wait until any particular day for making that start; but, having put it off until now, don't delay longer. Begin and end the New Year right, Improving a Proverb.

"I've always admired proverbs, my dear," Mr. Dusenberry said, as he rubbed his chin in a contemplative way. "They are chock full of signficance. They are laconic and logical. Now, for instance, there is the saying, 'Straws show which way the wind blows.' What could more tersely —"

"Yes," interrupted Mrs, Dusenberry, with a twinkle in her starboard eye. "If you'd sift the ashes every morning. instead of letting me sift them, you'd know more about the direction of the wind than all the straws in creation would show you."—Detroit Free Press,

A Peerless Bride.

A cosy, well-furnished room in a humble though cheery home. The fire burns brightly on the hearth and the rays of the setting sun shine brightly through the western windows. There are signs of unwonted quiet in the apartment; the noisy prattle of the children is hushed and the young wife stands with hands clasped in mute despair beside the bed on which lies Henry Sawdust; the king of the bunco-steerers sick with a fever. The face of the gray-haired physician is grave as he feels the sick man's pulse and looks at his parched skin and feverish lips.

"Tell me, doctor," she implored in piteous tones, "you do not give up all hope. Henry will be spared to me, will he not?"

"I trust so," said the physicion, "but his condition is such that he requires constant care and nursing, perfect quiet and the best of food and drink. How did his sickness begin? You should have sent for me long ago."

"He caught cold about two weeks ago on the Brooklyn bridge and it settled in his hand, which had been troubling him ever since he shook hands with that Scotchman and steered him into the joint. I begged him not to go out the next day, but he insisted on going over to the Cortland street ferry to meet that great excursion of people from the interior of the state. You know the autumn is Henry's harvest time, and he is so ambitious in his profession that it is hard for him to stay at home when the streets are full of countrymen going along with gripsacks in their hands and looking up at the tops of the houses. I then begged him not to go on the Brooklyn bridge, where the wind blows so cold, but he says there is no place in New York like it for suckers."

"Well," said the physician, "it will be a month at least before he will be able to go out, and meantime he must have plenty of good old port and the most delicate food you can procure for him. I will call again to-morrow. Good day, madam."

Not go out for a month! Plenty of good old port with prairie chickens! And where was the money for all this to come from? Poor Mary Sawdust sat down in her low rocking-chair and buried her head in her hands in hopeless despair. A moan from the sick man caused her to leap to her feet and hurry to his bedside. He was muttering incoherently in his sleep: "Glad to see you, Mr. Johnson—Just drawn a prize in the Havana Lottery—my uncle, the cashier of the Beanville Bank—take something with me."

Mary's blue eyes filled with tears. "Poor, dear Henry," she murmured; "even in his sleep he is working hard to support his wife and little ones. Oh, if I were only a man that I might put on an ulster, take the gold brick in my hand and go out on the bleak, cheerless bridge. But alas! I am only a woman, and there is but little that I can do."

She resumed her seat by the fire and brooded long and sadly over her unhappy lot, Then a voice seemed to whisper "Courage" in her ear; her face brightened and she sprang to her feet and softly approached the bed. Her husband was sleeping perfectly now, and, bidding her little daughter Effie keep watch beside him, she put on her hat and shawl, took her purse in her hand and hurried out. In half an hour she returned, bearing a large bundle which she carefully deposited in one corner of the room, then seizing pen and paper she sat down at the little centre-table and busied herself until far into the night.

* * * * * * * *

The days grew into weeks and Henry slowly regained his strength, while his devoted wife flitted in and out of the little apartment, sometimes remaining away an hour, and always with her mind intent on some great project. She brought home the choicest wines and most delicious game, and throughout all his illness the sufferer lacked for nothing. Whenever he asked her whence came all these good things Mary turned aside the question with an affectionate kiss, and promised that he should know all as soon as he was well again.

At last came the happy day when the good doctor said that he was well enough to leave his bed. Then Mary Sawdust took him by the hand and led into their parlor. "See, dear Henry!" she exclaimed what I have been able to do for you!"

Her husband could scarcely believe his eyes, for there on the table stood a new gold-plated brick and a bottle of the best dye for his mustache. A brand new ulster, fit to envelope the frame of a bank cashier's nephew, and a glittering new stovepipe hat hung on the wall, while on the mantelpiece stood a large picture with gilt frame, covered with Mary"s best shawl.

"What does all this mean?" he demanded horsely.

"I did it all, dear Henry," said his wife, tenderly. I saw that picture hanging in a pawnshop and I bought it dirt cheap and raffled it off. All the bunco-steerers in town—heaven bless those noble, generous men!—took tickets. Ana they were all so anxious to get it. See, dear Henry."

She threw aside the shawl and proudly displayed a beautiful oil painting of Henry F. Gillig, which had been sold together with other worthless possessions of the American Exchange.

Henry gazed with admiration at the familiar features.

"But who won it?" he asked at last.

"You did," replied Mary, proudly. "I took a ticket for you and threw for you—with your own set of dice. It will be a beautiful ornament for our happy little home. Will it not, dear husband?"

Henry Sawdust folded his wife to his heart in a passionate embrace.

"My darling!" he exclaimed, "you are, indeed, a peerless bunco-steerer's bride."—J. L. Ford, in New York World.

He Has Fifteen Hundred Wives.

A French missionary, who has just returned from Uganda, shares the opinion held by so many authorities that Stanley is safe. He declares it is absolutely impossible that, if Stanley had succumbed to an attack, the news should not have reached the missions. It seems that when the intrepid traveler started from the falls a report was spread that he was going to "eat up Uganda," according to the expression in fashion in those benighted reigons. The missionary thinks that Stanley is keeping quiet for the present, either because he has some political project in view, which is not yet ripe, or because he fears that his appearance might lead to a massacre of the English and French missionaries, particularly of the former, who are now at the court of Monanga, the soverign of Uganda.

The same Monanga is described as a puissant negro king, ruling over ten million subjects and as ferocious as he is powerful. He is accredited with being the happy possessor of fifteen hundred wives, five of whom he daily kills off for his amusement. Some time ago Monanga received from Asia Minor, through the medium of slave-dealers in Egypt, intelligence of the acquisitions made by England and Germany on the Zanzibar coast. He at once assembled all his couriers and made them swear that they would exterminate all the whites who might seek to "eat up Uganda." The first result of the ceremony was the imprisonment of Mr. Gordon, an English missionary, who had unluckly selected that very day to read out to Monanga a letter from Mr. Parker, a fellow missionary, reproaching that monarch with his enormities and exhorting him to turn over a new leaf. Mr. Gordon is, or was, in durance as a hostage. Monanga's very unpleasant behavior towards him warned the French missionaries to withdraw from his dominions, the only one who has remained behind being M. Sourdel, whose medical skill has been highly appreciated by the tyrant, who has a decided horror of death. Monanga is the largest slave-trader in central Africa. He supplies the Mohammedan dealers annually with about 150,000 slaves, which are transported from the Zanzibar coast to the Persian gulf and the Euphrates. Landed on the shores of Arabia the victims are sent to Asiatic Turkey, where they are sold "on the sly" through the medium of pashas, who receive about ten francs per head for their trouble. Many however, die on the road, and sometimes a whole cargo of these poor people are carried off by sickness. In short, the story told by this missionary is simply heartrendering, and he evidently inclines to the view that Stanley has been "keeping dark" through the fear that the whites whom Monanga had in his power might be summarily put to death, with insult and torture.—Ex.

At a Reading.

The spare professor, grave and bald,
Began his paper. It was called,
I think, "A Brief Historic Glance
At Russia, Germany and France."
A glance, but to my best belief
'Twas almost anything but brief—
A wide survey, in which the earth
Was seen before mankind had birth;
Strange monsters basked them in the sun,
Behemoth, armored glyptodon.
And in the dawn's unpracticed ray
The transient dodo winged its way;
Then by degrees, through silt and slough,
We reached Berlin—I don't know how.
The good professor's monotone
Had turned me into senseless stone
Instanter, but that near me sat
Hypatia in her new spring hat.
Blue eyed, intent, with lips whose bloom
Lighted the heavy curtained room.
Hypatia—ah, what lovely things
Are fashioned out of eighteen springs—
At first, in sums in this amount,
The eighteen winters do not count.
Just as my eyes were growing dim
With heaviness, I saw that slim,
Erect, elastic figure there,
Like a pond lily taking air.
She looked so fresh, so wise, so neat,
So altogether crisp and sweet,
I quite forgot what Bismarck said,
And why the Emperor shook his head,
And how it was Von Moltke's frown
Cost France another frontier town.
The only facts I took away
From the professor's theme that day
Were these: a forehead broad and low,
Such as the antique sculptures show;
A chin to Greek perfection true;
Eyes of Astarte's tender blue;
A high complexion without fleck
Or flaw, and curls about her neck.
—Thomas Bailey Aldrich, in Harper's.

William's Rebuke to His Guard.

I heard the other day a good story of the German Emperor, writes Henry Labouchere. During the recent maneuvers he was riding with his staff and came across two huge wagons on the Berlin road. Asking where they were going, the drivers replied that they were carrying food for the officers of the Guard. On this he ordered them back to Berlin. In the evening he went to the portion of the ground where the Guard was camped and found the officers hanging about, looking, like Sister Anne, along the Berlin road with a hungry air. "What is the matter?" he asked. They said that their provisions had not arrived and that they were to reach them from Berlin in a small cart. "I have just ridden along the Berlin road," said the Emperor, "and I can assure you that there was no cart; but I met two huge wagons, which were bringing provisions for the officers of some regiment, and, as I thought that officers and soldiers ought to fare alike during the maneuvers, I sent them back to Berlin."

He Would Forget to Order the Meat.

"Miss Clara," he began passionately, "let me open my heart to you; let me tell you how long and deeply I have loved you; how from the first moment your sweet presence beamed upon me, I have——."

Just then a deafening noise outside disturbed them and they hastened to the the window. After resuming their seats, he went on:

"Oh-er-h'm-singular-what was the subject of our conversation when we were interupted? Ah, yas, I remember. From the moment your sweet presence first dawned upon me, I have longed to make you my wife."

"That can never be, Mr. Chalk," replied the girl firmly, "You are too absent-minded."—Epoch.

A TARTAR BREAKFAST.

What a Traveler Saw During the Preparation of a Morning Meal.

I went into one of the stone-built recesses, where several of our Tartars were crouching round a small grass-root fire, and was considerably edified by watching them cooking and dispatching their morning repast. To begin with, a very dirty copper vessel was put on the fire and filled with some green weed like nettles, barley, flour and water. While one of the men stirred this pottage round and round with a wooden ladle, another produced some raw meat—a bit of the dong I had shot. This he proceeded to tear up into small strips and throw them on the fire, every now and then popping a raw lump into his mouth and masticating it with apparent gusto. Even the bits on the fire were quickly disposed of after being merely singed.

As soon as the pottage was considered ready it was ladled out in little wooden cups, like the whisky "quaighs" of the Highlands, minus the handles, which each man produced from inside the breast of his dirty woolen coat, and gulped up from them with a prodigious amount of noise. After being replenished again and again until the pot was emptied, the cups were licked clean and redeposited from whence they had been taken. Another course of flesh was about to be partaken of after the manner of the first, but a regard for my own appetite for breakfast prevented my waiting to see it discussed. These hardy Tartars are quite independent of any other dishes beyond their little wooden bowls. In these they mix their suttoo (meal made from barley) with water and salt and make an expeditious repast of it.—Blackwood's Magazine.

Where Day Begins.

According to the way in which this arrangement is now carried out, the first land that the new day dawns upon is Easter island, about 230 miles west of the coast of Chilli, South America. That is to say, the 2d of July breaks here within a few hours of the 1st, having broken on the American coast to the east, and the two days run on alongside—the 2d in Easter island and places west, and 1st in all places on the American continent. We may, therefore, realize this idea—that at 7:20 o'clock any morning of our lives in Great Britain the next day is commencing in the world, and is to be found at this little island in the Pacific ocean, whence, in due course, it will travel round to us. But to have thus the start of the world is not an unmitigated advantage to these islanders.

Suppose one of them sails east to America, what is the result? He will find that they keep the day there under a different date, and he will have to reckon one day in his calendar twice over to put himself right with their notions. On the other hand, if an American crosses from east to west this wonderful magic line where the day begins, he will find the dates in this fresh part of the world are one in advance of him, and he must needs strike a day out of his calendar to keep up with the times.

This fact was curiously illustrated in the case of Magellan, the Portugese captain, who sailed around the world from east to west in 1522, and having crossed the magic line of "day's birth" in his wonderings, his calendar became, of course, a day in arrear. The sailors were completely ignorant of this, and finding, on landing at home, that their Sabbath was falling on Monday, they accused one another with tampering with the reckoning. It was not for some time that the true and simple explanation of the wonderful loss of time was discovered.—Ex.

Faults of Many Mothers.

American women of all classes are, as a rule, sinfully negligent of some of the duties which pertain to health, especially exercise in the open air. The excuse that their many cares engross them, and that they, in consequence, have but little opportunity for leaving their homes, is scarcely sufficient. The number who actually can not enjoy each day an hour's outing must be small, indeed, even among the class forced to work the hardest. Not only do many women fail in this respect in their duty to themselves, but their young children suffer in consequence of the same neglect. From one week's end to another during the winter not a few of them keep their little ones in overheated rooms, if not huddled around the kitchen stove, and the result is we find them, as spring approaches, weak, puny and ailing. In such families, colds, coughs, sore throats and the like are common affections. There is scarcely a day during the coldest season when even the baby can not be taken out of doors. Mothers should understand that upon the daily enjoyment of fresh and open air depends, in a great degree, the health of their little ones, as well as themselves; it is, in fact, absolutely indispensable to the well being of all.—Boston Journal of Health.

Bank of France Notes.

The new notes which the Bank of France is about to issue will be in two colors, blue and pink, and so blended as to produce a general tint approaching violet. It is believed at the bank that these notes are inimitable, except at an expenditure of time and money that would effectually check enterprise in that direction. The new 50 and 100 franc notes are now being printed, and those 500 and 1,000 francs will soon leave the the engravers' hands. The new notes have been produced in a twentieth part of the time spent on those which are now to be gradually withdrawn from circulation. M. Barre was three years engaged upon the model of the present 1,000-franc note, and that of 100 francs was five years in the artist's hands.

No man can hold office in this country until he has attained his majority.—Puck.

Women as Wage-Earners.

The steady increase in the number of women finding employment in the different branches of business activity has resolved itself into a serious problem, which is meriting more or less attention from time to time as circumstances bring the facts to public notice. There can be no denying the fact that the number of feminine wage earners is steadily increasing, but if the matter be considered without regard to sentiment or prejudice it may prove less extraordinary or alarming than some are willing to consider it.

No one will deny that the home circle and the domestic duties form the natural sphere of woman, and nowhere does she appear to better advantage and is so thoroughly a success as in the pursuit of this her logical vocation. While every one is thoroughly agreed on this point, it is not to be over looked that its very existence presupposes a privilege of dependence upon others, while fate has not meted out impartially to all women, while to many it has been utterly denied.

The numerical excess of women over our male population may be largely accountable for the number of the weaker sex dependent altogether on their own exertions for their very existence, or it may be due to other less apparent reasons. But whatever the cause, the fact nevertheless remains that the number of women wage-earners is steadily increasing.

That the average woman prefers the hard struggle for existence that characterizes the world's commercial life to the quiet and seclusion of the home circle is not proven by the fact of her presence as a factor in the industrial problem. Quite the contrary is established by the readiness with which the former state is abandoned for the other whenever circumstances permit.

It is therefore unreasonable for men to complain that equally intelligent beings, laboring under the same necessity of self-support, should be permitted to compete with them in avocations hitherto exclusively restricted to the sterner sex. That women receive smaller pay for equal work, which is one of the arguments used against them with singular inconsistency, is rather the outcome of the prejudice that has for ages kept the sex in an inferior station rather than to pay any option on their own part.

As happens with all problems, this one is slowly but surely settling itself. The large number of women that have been compelled to earn their livelihood has opened up new avocations more peculiarly fitted to their capabilities.

For instance, great numbers of women have found employment as correspondents and type writers, where formerly but a very few men were engaged in like capacities. Again, thousands of young women have been found suited to clerkships in retail stores where women are the principal customers.

In like manner in many other lines have women shown themselves capable of carving out their own destinies, hence the complaint that they have taken an undue advantage of their masculine competitors is not borne out by facts.

Instead, therefore, of complaining of the position of women in business life, the sterner sex should do everything to encourage them and better their condition. The world owes everyone a living who is industrious enough to strive for it, hence there can be no just reason to complain of overcrowding. Chivalry and manhood both demand that woman's position as a wage earner should be recognized in a much more generous spirit than has hitherto been customary.—New Orleans Picayune.

Fattening Oysters.

The business of planting oysters and having them grow properly after they are planted is not very well understood by the general public. There is a great deal of money invested in the industry along the Delaware Bay, and occasionally some of those heavily interested in a financial manner come out at the little end of the horn. The process of catching oysters and fattening them for the market is, to say the least, a very interesting one. After the oysters are caught they are placed in an immense float, which is air-tight on all four sides. There are a number of corks in the bottom of this float, and after the oysters have been carefully laid out on the bottom the corks are withdrawn, allowing the float to fill with water and go to the bottom of the bay. The oysters will then open their mouths like any other fish and drink to their heart's content. After two or three tides have swept over them they are brought to the surface once more. By this time they have become plump oysters, ready for market. The supply at the present time is about equal to the demand. Choice prime oysters sell at from $7 to $9 per 1,000, while "cullens" rate at from $2.50 to $3.50 per 1,000.—New York Graphic.

Inverted Morality.

It is probable that nearly all who think of conduct at all think of it too much; it is certain we all think too much of sin. We are not damned for doing wrong, but for not doing right; Christ would never hear of negative morality: "thou shalt" was ever His word, with which He superceded "thou shalt not." To make our idea of morality center on forbidden acts is to defile the imagination and to introduce into our judgments of our fellowmen a secret element of gusto. If a thing is wrong for us we should not dwell upon the thought of it, or we shall soon dwell upon it with inverted pleasure. If we cannot drive it from our minds—one thing of two. Either our creed is in the wrong and we must more indulgently remodel it, or else, if our morality be in the right, we are criminal lunatics and should place our persons in restraint.—Scribner's.

Miss Ewald's Protege.

"He is handsome, he speaks correctly, and there is a kind of superb independence about him that I admire. What a pity he is only a farmer!" Miss Ewald mused looking over the fence at the reapers in the wheat field, and singling out Brian Jeffrey's straight, well-knit figure, in its cool, blue cotton overalls and blouse.

How easily and lightly he swung the scything-cradle around, the yellow grain falling before the glittering blade.

Miss Ewald has been at Glasslands a week. She was twenty six and thoroughly disgusted with the world, or so she imagined when she elected to spend the Summer in the country, instead of going with her friends on the usual round of gayety at the watering places. "I am tired of folly and fashion, of society—of everything," she had said, and packing her trunks went away to the loneliness, the cool, deep shades, and the simple, primitive life of Grasslands, bewildering Farmer Jason and his comely wife with her beauty and grace and city toilets, and making aquaintance with Brian Jeffrey, the farmer's nephew.

"He is probably as old as I am, but with as little worldly knowledge as I had at sixteen," shifting her white linen parasol a little, her eyes still fixed on the blue-clad figure in the field.

A brilliant idea had shaped itself in her mind during the week. She would help the young man to a higher plane of life, point the way into the intellectual world.

"Why not?" she had reasoned. "Of course, my friends," with a slight curl of the lip, "would deride the plan, but I see no harm in it. He is here shut off from the world, and with no examples to stimulate ambition or make him desire culture."

The morning that she stood by the fence looking into the wheat field, she decided to speak to him about it, offer, with tact and delicacy, to loan him books and papers, and her aid in turning his thoughts into higher channels.

That evening as she stood on the veranda gathering a bunch of creamy roses for the bosom of her light blue gown, he came and leaned against the column near her.

The fading daylight seemed to gather about her golden head and lovely purely colored face, and the young farmer's dark-gray eyes were fixed steadily on her. It was a good time and place to unfold her purpose.

His face flushed, and he looked down at his shapely, sunburnt hands, while she gently explained that all her books and magazines were at his service, and that she would be pleased to have him read with her sometimes.

He seemed to catch instantly at her full meaning, and the light in his gray eyes almost startled her.

"Would you indeed be so kind to an ignorant poor wretch?" he murmured.

Her fair face flushed.

"It is no great act of kindness, Mr. Jeffrey. I understand the limitations of your surroundings, and if you will accept—"

"I do, most gladly, gratefully!" he quickly interrupted. "In a country neighborhood, where all, or nearly all, are on the same level, where an almanac and the Bible constitute a library, there is not much hope for literary advancement."

It was a strange Summer to Rosamond Ewald, one utterly out of the line of conventional experiences.

Never had teacher so apt a pupil, and the lines of study took a much wider range than she had ever imagined.

Favorite authors were invested with new interest, and she found all her own mental faculties stimulated and quickened. She forgot that she had ever been weary of life.

It was delightful to have such an intelligent, sympathetic protege.

"I never knew before that a simple act of kindness could give one so much pleasure. I feel like a different creature from the languid, ennuied woman who came up here."

One evening she was suprised and delighted at the sound of a tenor voice sining "My Queen," with an eloquence of expression unexpected.

She stepped to the parlor door and saw Brian Jeffrey sitting before the small, almost tuneless old piano, playing and singing.

He stopped instantly at the sight of her.

"I did not know you could sing, Mr. Jeffrey," advancing into the dimly lighted room.

"Only a little, Miss Edwald," he said, hastily, looking as guilty as if he had been detected in a crime.

"You sing extremely well, and with wonderful expression."

Her frank, warm praise overmastered the self-control he had been putting upon himself for days.

He looked at her, a passionate fire leaping to his gray eyes.

"I ought to sing that song well, with you always in my thoughts," he said, in a low quick tone.

Her startled eyes met his; she turned away, but he caught her hand.

"I know what presmption, what madness it is, but I love you, Miss Ewald—Rosamond, my queen!"

She flushed and paled.

"It may seem a poor return for all your goodness to give you my heart, but it is an honest heart, and—"

All the haughty Ewald blood flamed up. She snatched her hand from his grasp.

"Sir, you surely forget your station! You presume unpardonably upon my favor. Let me pass."

He grew white as death, bowed and stepped aside, and she went proudly away to her own room, only to throw herself on the bed when she arrived there, sobbing like the weakest schoogirl.

Never in her life had such contending emotions possessed her. Hot waves of crimson swept over her throat and face as she recalled his words, the passion of his eyes.

But she has taught him a lesson. He treated her with perfect courtesy, but there were no more delightful talks and readings. He held gravely aloof, meeting her only at their meals, and she found the time hanging heavily on her hands.

A feverish unrest took possession of her, and as the time for her return to the city drew nearer she grew graver.

One day one of the children ran breathlessly in crying:

"The cotten gin's bu'sted, and I 'spect Cousin Brian's killed!"

Rosamond started to her feet and ran bareheaded out into the yard, through the gate and down the lane toward the gin. Killed! Brian Jeffrey, in all his strength and youth, killed!

The hot sun beat upon her fair head, dazzled her eyes; she grew faint.

"Miss Ewald!"

She stopped, looked up with a low cry, then held out her hands.

He stood before her, untouched unharmed.

"Oh, Brian, Brian, they told me you had been killed! Forgive my wicked pride, my cruel words, for I love you!"

The truth was out at last, the truth she had been learning ever since their estrangement.

He caught her hands and kissed them passionately.

"Forgive you? What could I not forgive you for those words, my dearest? As no lives were lost, I thank heaven for the accident that has caused this betrayal of your heart!"

* * * * * * * * * *

Miss Ewald was at a reception, gowned in creamy silk, and with diamonds at her throat. It was the first reception of the season, and her friends gathered around her, declaring that the Summer had mysteriously changed her, but the vivacious, laughing hostess bore her off to a pretty music-room.

"I want to introduce you to a friend of my husband's, a fine musician, wealthy, cultivated, who has travelled and studied abroad as well as in America. If you were not so flinty hearted, Rosamond, I should hope to make a match between you."

Miss Ewald laughed softly as she thought of Brian Jeffrey, and turned the simple pearl ring he had placed upon her finger.

What would her fashionable friends say if they knew that she had promised to marry farmer, and loved him?

The music-room was deserted save for a solitary figure standing before the grand piano. Not until the gentleman turned, and her hostess said—"Mr. Jeffrey!" did she realize that it was Brian himself who stood before her in faultless evening dress, his face and hands still showing the sunburn of his labor at Grasslands.

"You deceived me!" she cried, pale with conflicting emotions, when they were left alone.

"My dearest, you decided yourself, by taking it for granted that I was an uncultivated tiller of the soil, and then it was too tempting to learn all your sweet nature as my benefactress. I made the family promise not to undeceive you. Are you angry, darling? I called at your home this evening to tell you of your mistake, to ask your pardon for the deception; and learning you were here, came on determined to see you. The owner of Grasslands is indeed my uncle, and I went out there to work this past season because I needed outdoor exercise, and because I like farming. Rosamond, it was the happiest Summer of my life."

"And of mine," she murmured at last, her lips meeting his.

Then he sang "My Queen," in a way that drew half the guests to the room; and with a happy smile, Miss Ewald thought her protege would do her great honor.—Saturday Night.

The Hired Man of Old.

Manchester, N. H., Mirror.

This is the day when the "hired man" who is engaged to work on a farm for the season reports for duty, provided, of course, that there is somewhere a farm on which such a relic of a by-gone age as the hired man is to be found this year. What an institution he used to be in the days when we were young! A thoroughbred Yankee; not a drop of imported blood in his veins; strong and lithe, and active and tireless, intelligent, fairly well educated, skilled in his business, and, as a rule, industrious beyond the belief of this ten-hour generation.

From the time he drove his ax into the woodpile in the door yard on the 1st of April until the close of the season, after harvesting, he expected to work, and he did work, not from sun to sun, but from dawn to darkness, and then did the milking and fed the pigs afterward. His day was fourteen, fifteen, even sixteen hours long; and it never occurred to him that it should be shorter. He was no specialist. He could do anything. He was smart with a scythe, handy with a hoe, cute with a cradle and experienced with an ax. He knew how much grain and grass seed were required to the acre, when grass was fit to cut, and when it was hayed enough to "go in," and he did not need to be told when to drop turnip seed in the cornfield, or how to put corn in the shock.

He could build wall, make cider, shingle the barn, make a hayrack, or doctor a sick hog. It was safe to leave him to work alone. And he got for his services $10, $12, possibly $15 a month, and saved three-fourths of it. Then, when he had worked eight or ten seasons and had accumulated a few hundred dollars, he probably married the "hired girl," who had been at work for $1 a week and saved half of that, bought a farm, got out of debt little by little, educated his children and sent them to the city to preach law, or work in store or shop, while he stayed on the old homestead.

SECRETS OF THE TOILET.

The Cause of Pimples and "Fleshworms," and How they Should be Treated.

Pimples are an affliction to which all people are more or less subject the eruption shows that the blood is in an impure condition and attention should be directed to improving the general health by proper exercise, frequent baths, and the avoidance of greasy food. But this general advice, while excellent at all times and efficacious in cases of occasional pimples, is not sufficient for those whom sedentary habits, close, impure atmospheres or other causes predispose to constant eruptions at once painful, annoying and disfiguring. To these sufferers the following recipe are recommended.

1. Camphor spirits dabbed on the spot (after washing) one, two or three times a day.

2. Every morning after washing bathe the face in a lotion composed of two grains of sublimate of mercury and half a pint of almond emulsion.

3. One quart of milk, one quarter of a pound of saltpetre, five cents' worth of oil of aniseed, two cents' worth of oil of cloves, half a gill of the best vinegar. Let the mixture stand in the sun for a fortnight. Then bottle and cork tightly, and in another week the wash will be fit for use.

4. Twelve ounces of beef marrow, one-quarter ounce cloves, one-quarter ounce cinnamon, one-half ounce storax, one-half ounce benzoin, one-half ounce orris root, rose water. Steep the marrow in water ten days, changing the water daily, then put in rose water for twenty-four hours and then drain. Mix the other ingredients together, strain and add to the marrow. Place the jar in a saucepan of boiling water for an hour; pour off and strain. This preparation improves with age and is excellent for freckles and sunburn as well as eruptions.

5. Bicarbonate of soda, eighteen grains; distilled water, half pint; oil of almonds, six drops. Wash off in the morning with a cloth dipped in water and cologne or bay rum.

6. Bicarbonate of soda, to scruples; glycerine, one dram; spermaceti pomade. Apply at night.

7. One part alcohol and five parts of soft water. Add a very little distilled vinegar, and shake well before using.

8. An occasional dose of sulphur every third morning, followed by a dose of Epson salts and two days after a hot or Turish bath.

9. Dissolve borax in warm water and apply when cool.

"Flesh-worms," so called, are nothing but dirt and grease filling up pores. When a pore gets overburdened with work, or the opening is filled up with dirt, the secretions cannot pass off. They condense, forming a thick, oily substance. The blackhead gets its color from actual dirt. When squeezed out of the pore they retain the shape of the mold, and have every appearance of a worm. The remedy is cleanliness. To remove them and to keep them from returning use ammonia (spirits of heartshorn). A quart costs ten cents. Wet the spots with as strong a solution as can be borne, two or three times a day. Put a tablespoonfull in every quart of water used to wash with—whether for hands or face. It is perfectly harmless, it bleaches the skin, it stimulates and invigorates the pores and it removes all grease, but it must be kept out of the eyes. Where the "black-heads" are strong, help the hartshorn by expelling them before using it. It never fails when properly applied. Other toilet washes and special remedies are:

1. One pint of distilled rose water, 40 grains of sulphate of zinc. Rub the face with a rough towel for two or three minutes and then touch the spots affected with the lotion.

2. Fluid potash, 1 dram; oil of sweet almonds, 1 oz. Shake well and add rose water, 1 oz.; rain-water, 6 oz. Apply as in the preceding.

3. Wash in warm water and dry with a coarse towel. Then rub in with a soft cloth a lotion composed of 2 ounces white brandy, 1 ounce cologne, ½ ounce liquor potassa.

4. Sulphate of copper, 20 grains; rose water, 4 ounces; water, 12 ounces.

5. Tepid water in which a little borax has been dissolved. Apply with a coarse towel and use considerable friction.

6. Mix flour of sulphur in a little milk; let it stand three hours; then, without disturbing the sulphur, rub the milk well into the skin. In ten minutes wash the face with cold water. Apply cold cream at night.

The Terrible French Rifle.

London Telegraph.

According to all accounts the new "Lebel rifle" is a wondrous weapon, and is destined to do terrible things in the hands of the French soldiers. The members of the Academy of Medicine wishing to dingonise the physical consequences of the wounds inflicted by the bullets of the gun, recently had experiments made on twenty corpses, probably those of paupers whom nobody knows, of those of ill-fated waifs, picked up an the morgue. The bodies were placed at the ordinary firing distance, from 200 yards up to a mile or so. The bullets whizzed through the bones and pierced them without fracturing them, as is done by the bullets of the Gras rifle. The wounds, if they be called so, which ware inflicted were small in their punctures, and consequently very dangerous and difficult to heal. Injuries inflicted at short distances were so considerable that, in the opinion of the surgeons they would be almost incurable. At the longest range—2,000 meters—a poplar tree was hit, but the bullet did not go through the tree. At 1,200 meters the tree was pierced through and through. The discharges of the rifle are unaccompanied by smoke, and the reports are comparatively feeble.

NOT SO BAD AS PAINTED.

Bishop Newman Says the World is Daily Growing Better.

That thoughtful, observing and eloquent man, John P. Newman, Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was in town this week. His familiar figure retains all of its striking individuality, and his expressive countenance shows little sign of the years of labor in behalf of the Church with which he is identified. Bishop Newman believes that the world is growing better. Owing to his position, his travels, his association with able men and his habits of close observation, his judgment should have weight. When asked by a Mail and Express reporter if Christianity is advancing, the condition of the Church prosperous and the outlook for the future hopeful, he said:

"Christianity is developing now as never before a twofold force—it is both defensive and aggressive. The Church has passed through the crusade of Ingersollism, and is to-day stronger for the fight. There has been no such absolute failure to injure faith, especially that of the public men of our country, as this latest phrase of infidelism. There was a time when our public men seemed to halt under the power of invective, searching interrogation and ribald blasphemy. The pause gave them an opportunity to think, and the timely thought was, infidelity takes all and gives nothing.

"It is a significant fact that, in the late campaign, infidel orators would not be tolerated by the people. The most potent fact, which commanded large attention, was Gen. Harrison's faith in Christ, and the next President of the United States will be a fervent Christian.

THE DANGER OF SOME BOOKS.

"The church is passing through another ordeal, more insidious and, therefore, more dangerous, than Ingersollism. It is the covert attacked upon the divine mission of Jesus and the beneficient miracles that he wrought in the well-known novel, 'Robert Elsmere.' Fascinating in style, picturesque in character, it is cowardly in its method of attack. It is not a Unitarian book. Unitarians are too honorable to strike in disguise. The book is essentially infidel. It is the presentation of an apparently young and noble mind—by no means an individual thinker—overwhelmed with doubts by a superior intellect. The gist of the whole book is this—a witness to be judged by the preconception of his age. There was a preconception that a Messiah would come—therefore he came. There was a preconception that he would work miracles—therefore miracles were wrought. This is the line of attack. Hume called in question the test of Bible witnesses because this test was contrary to common experience. The authoress of this book questions the reliability of this testimony because influenced by a superstitious conception of a previous age. It is a new assault upon Christ and his miracles, but the argument is fallacious. It has been the preconception of all ages that man would be free in all the grandeur of his individuality. To-day he is thus free. The preconception and the realization are a sublime correlation. Is liberty false because it was preconceived? Is the divinity of Jesus a fallacy because of its preconception? Or His miracles fancies because the dream of a prophet or the vision of the seer? How different the issue of the struggle of the eloquent F. W. Robertson, whose sermons are household words. Turn to Principal Tulloch's work on 'Religion of the Nineteenth Century,' wherein he portrays in vivid language the oscillations of Robertson to the utmost doubt and the return of the pendulum of his faith forever after to swing in harmony with reason and revelation. All persons who read 'Robert Elsmere' should read the life of Robertson."

RELIGION AND CRIME.

"Is the progress of religion decreasing the amount of crime in the world?"

"You should remember that law creates crime. We have multiplied offences by the multiplicity of our legislation. Because of this the number of criminals may be greater now than it was fifty years ago; but compare society now and then as to what may be called the great moralities of life, and the statistics of all nations show that there is less vice and more virtue in the world to-day than ever before. But you cannot gauge the progress of Christianity by arithmetic. Many are in prison who should be out, many are out who should be in. There are other and better criteria to go by. The beneficence of science, the reign of kindness, the respect for public morality, the honor and honesty of our public men, the power of the church for good—all point to an advance in humanity toward a better future. One man is a pessimist, another an optimist. The former lives in his memory, the latter lives in his imagination. I would live in my experience and observation."

"In what direction is the church making the greatest progress?"

"In the union of godliness and devotion. It took us a long time to realize that a churchman might be devout without having a particle of godliness in his soul. Long prayers were offered, long psalms sung, ceremonies, festivals, days of fasting were studiously observed; but in the everyday life there was neither charity toward man nor holiness toward God. There is less devotion in the church now then ever before, but there is a deeper spirituality, so that all things secular are made sacred, and life is an endless Sabbath for good works and holy aspirations. As an outcome, our educational institutions are centers of religious thought, literature is purified, and religious toleration a sublime fact. Public morality is gaining the mastery, and the church of today is the home and hope of humanity."

"Is there an increase of harmony between the different religious denominations?"

"We do not want too much harmony in that direction. Denominations are providential. Each has a mission to perform. No one denomination is adapted to all minds. Figures prove that my own church has the largest mission, yet there are millions of people on earth that would find the life thought more fully realized in some other creed and under some other church policy. But there is no claim of superiority of one over the other as in former times. My own church presents to the world scholars as ripe, preachers as eloquent, writers as profound and citizens as wealthy and of as high social position as any branch of the American church. Rome's claim of universal supremacy and England's claim of Apostolic succession are the fancies that amuse us, rather than deter. On certain great issues all branches of the Christian church are essentially a unit. This has been largely reached by the American Foreign Bible societies and by the Sabbath observance organization."

How to Prepare a Rose Jar.

The foundation of the mixture is always the petals of some fragrant flower, usually either violets or roses, and, since the latter is more common, we will use it in this recipe. Pick off the rose leaves, separating the petals, until a quart can is nearly full, then put in two tablespoons of salt, and shake well. Shake every day for two weeks, then add a teaspoon each of cinnamon, allspice and cloves, and shake daily for two or more weeks, or until the leaves look dry and discolored. The final scenting is a matter of choice. A favorite scent is made by mixing in a quarter of an ounce of heliotrope powder, a few drops oil of musk and a few drops oil of rose with the leaves, to which, about once a year, a very little oil of rose is added. The two perfumes, musk and rose, blend so pleasantly that the odor is delightful, even to those who dislike musk. If other delicate perfumes are desired, they need, nearly always, with them a "fixative" of something stronger. Cologne goes well as a vehicle for patchouly, lavander and verbena; rose water for violet, jasmine and ylang-ylang, and a vanilla for tuberose and heliotrope. Without these vehicles, delicate perfumes are too fugitive to be of permanent use. The essential oils constituting perfumes are all expensive, and the preparation of rose jars with them is never very cheap. Some idea of the quantity of musk one can get for a dollar may be had when it is known that the best musk is forty dollars an ounce. But to offset this, only a small quantity is needed—fifty cents' worth of rose and the same quantity of musk, mixed with alcohol, will strongly scent two quarts of rose leaves. The alcohol is simply for a foundation, so that the perfumery will both be visible to the naked eye and sufficient to dampen the leaves. A very good substitute for these expensive oils is made by dampening the leaves with cologne water and stirring in sachet powder of any scent desired; to this, from time to time, is added a little perfumery harmonizing with the powder. In the old days, before perfumery was as common as it is now, it is related that, when the house was in order for the day, the housewife would take a jar of fragrant herbs and go from room to room stirring it, that its subtle odor might pervade everything. And in the "best room," the jar was allowed to stand uncovered for a certain number of minutes daily.—Eva M. Niles.

Smocking.

Smocking is a species of needlework recently introduced, which is of ancient date. A kerchief of smocking was an elegant part of the costume of noble dames of the age of Queen Elizabeth. This work is in diamond pattern. The medium sized work is done by laying first two pleats, three-eights of an inch wide, with their edges close together, then catching these pleats together at intervals of five-eights of an inch, and then laying next to these two other pleats, which should be tacked together in the same way, in a line with the tackings of the other set. The two sets are finally tacked together by tacking in a line between the other tackings, and only joining the inside pleat of one set to the inside pleat of the other. If the work is now stretched a little, it will be found to form a line of hollow diamonds; another line may be added to this, forming a yoke, square, or anything the worker desires in smocking. The diamond work may be stretched on a foundation or left to shape itself, as in the case of a yoke, which can readily be made so it will shape itself, after the waist is put on. This work is especially pretty for children's wool dresses, ladies' blouses, and many other purposes. Soft woolen, like cashimere and light camel's hair and foule cloths and surah silks, are especially lovely, smocked.

Memory.

O memory! thou fond deceiver,
  Still unfortunate and vain,
To former joys recurring ever,
  And turning all the past to pain,
Thou, like the world, th' oppressed oppressing,
  Thy smiles increase the wretch's woe!
And he who wants each other blessing
  In thee must ever find a foe.

No Lighting.

Mr. Sitton, a subscriber at Chattanooga, relates that a young countryman near that city, desirous of paying attention to a certain lady and not knowing what to say, broached the subject in the following unique manner:

"Miss Julia, may I fly around you?"

To which the young lady replied quickly:

"Yes, but don't 'light."

Early Mental Culture a Mistake.

The history of the most distinguished men leads to the conclusion that early mental culture is not necessary to produce the highest powers of mind. There is scarcely an instance of a great man, one who has accomplished great results, and has obtained the gratitude of mankind, who in early life received an education in reference to the wonderful labors which he afterward performed.

"I was brought up among the highlands of Connecticut," said Chancellor Kent, "and was never kept on the high-pressure plan of instruction. I was roaming over the fields and fishing and sailing, and swimming and riding, and playing ball, so as to be but superficially learned when I entered college. I was not in college half the time. I was at home, at leisure, or at gentle work, and much on horseback, but never in the least dissipated. When I went to study law I had my own leisure, and great exercise and relaxation in enchanting rides, and home visits, until I got to the bar. I lived plain, drank nothing but water, ate heartily of all plain, wholesome food that came in my way, was delighted with rural scenery, and active and healthy as I could be. It was not until I was twenty-four that I found that I was very superficially taught, and then voluntarily betook myself to books. The ardor and rapidity with which I pursued my law and literary course were great and delightful, and my health and spirits were sound and uniform, and neither has faltered down to this day.

Herbert Spencer says: "The ordinary treatment of children is in various ways seriously prejudicial. It errs in deficient feeding, in deficient clothing, in deficient exercise (among girls at least) and in excessive mental application. Considering the regime as a whole, its tendency is too exacting; it asks too much and gives too little. In the extent to which it taxes the vital energies, it makes the juvenile life much more like the adult life than it should be."

"The educational abomination of desolation of the present day," says Prof. Huxley, "is the stimulation of young people to work at high pressure by incessant competitive examinations. Some wise man (who probably was not an early riser) has said of early risers in general that they are conceited all the forenoon and stupid all the afternoon. It is too often true of the unhappy children who are forced to rise too early in their classes, they are conceited all the forenoon of their life, and stupid all the afternoon. The vigor and freshness which should have been stored up for the hard struggle of practicle life have been washed out of them by precocious mental debauchery, by book-gluttony and lesson bibbing. Their faculties are worn out by the strain put upon their callow brains, and they are demoralized by worthless childish triumphs before the real work of life begins."—Shirley Dare.

Washington's Inauguration Oath.

New York Commercial Advertiser.

In an article recently published in in the New York Tribune the statement is made, on the authority of the late Col. James Watson Webb, that his father, General Samuel B. Webb, as grand marshal of the inauguration of Washington on April 30, 1789, held the Bible upon which he (Washington) took the oath of office as president. Every student of American history knows the inaccuracy of this statement, and I have waited to see it contradicted by some one more interested in the question than the writer.

The marshal on the occasion was Colonel Morgan Lewis, and the Bible was held by the secretary of the senate, Samuel S. Otis.

In confirmation of this I need only refer to a copy of the official program of the exercises, still preserved in the archives of the New York historical society, where it may be seen.

Irving, in his life of Washington, thus records the solemn proceeding.

"The chancellor (Livingston) advanced to administer the oath prescribed by the constitution, and Mr. Otis, the secretary of the Senate, held up the Bible on the crimson cushion; the oath was read slowly and distinctly; Washington at the same time laying his hand on the open Bible. When it was concluded he replied solemnly: 'I swear, so help me God.' Mr. Otis would have raised the Bible to his own lips, but he bowed down reverently and kissed it."

Special interest attaches to the accuracy of this statement, from the near approach of the observance of the centennial on the 30th of April next, for which great preparations are making, and every fact bearing upon the original observance should be indisputably established.

Time Wasted with Bad Spelling.

Dr. Gladstone has made elaborate investigations in the schools of England and other countries to ascertain the time devoted to teaching spelling. He finds that 720 hours at least are lost to each scholar, that an Italian child of nine years will read and spell as correctly as English children at thirteen, though the Italian began his lessons two years later. It is about the same with the Germans and Swedes. This extra time is given to civics and useful sciences. The illiteracy of English-speaking nations is startling. There were 5,658,144 persons of ten years and over who reported themselves illiterate at our census of 1870, 6,239,958, at the census of 1880. The nearly illiterate are probably as many more. England is worse off than we are. But the other protestant countries of Europe have almost none. One of the causes of this excessive illiteracy among English-speaking peoples is the badness of English spelling. The reform of spelling is a patriotic and philanthropic reform.—Prof. F. A. March

Good in One Thing---Good in All.

Miss Frances Power Cobb has probably hit the truth in the judgment which she thus pronounces: "Though we read of Mrs. Jellybys in novels, I have failed yet to find, in a pretty large experience of real life, a single case in which a woman who exercised public spirit, even to the extent of self-devotion, was not also an admirable and conscientious daughter, wife, mother, or mistress of a household. This specter of the female politician who abandons her family for the sake of passing bills in parliament is just as complete an allusion of the masculine brain as the older specter whom Sydney Smith laid by a joke—the woman who would 'forsake an infant for a quadratic equation.'"

A Ridiculous Notion.

"There are some men," says the New York Ledger, "who cultivate white hands, with fair nails. For nothing else do they care very particularly; all is well if only their hands be fine. There is even a ridiculous notion that elegant hands are the most unequivocal test of what is called good birth. We can say, for our part, that the finest hands we ever saw belonged to a woman who kept a butcher's stall in Fulton Market. So much for the nonsense about fine hands.

A. J. COLBOM, Esq., Editor of the Somerset Herald, writes: "I can recommend ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM as being the best remedy for colds and coughs I ever used."

ASTORIA, ILLS., April 6, 1883.
GENTLEMEN,—I can cheerfully say your ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM, which I have sold for the past fifteen years, sells better than any cough remedy, and gives general satisfaction. 'Tis frequently recommended by the medical profession here. Yours truly, H. C. MOONEY, Druggist.

LAFAYETT, R. I., October 12, 1883.
GENTLEMEN,—Allow me to say that, after using three bottles of ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM for a bad attack of bronchitis, I am entirely cured. I send this voluntarily, that those afflicted may be benefited. Yours respectfully, BURRILL H. DAVIS.

It is an old adage, "To be forewarned is to be forearmed." So let it be in your case, who read this, and keep on hand ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM, which is sold by all druggists.

Fisher Bulletin.

Mr. Hugh Thompson returned from St. Paul last Saturday.

That fat and jolly traveling man, Frank Gravel, was in town last evening.

Mr. Robert Brownlee and sister Jennie left Thursday for a visit to friends at Inkster.

Father Lawlor was in town Thursday. We are glad to see him out again, after his late illness.

Levi S. Myers informs us that he will put in 1,000,000 feet of logs at Fosston this winter.

As we stated last week, there is no occasion for any scare about diphtheria. It is no way likely to become epidemic.

At a citizens meeting at Crookston, Thursday night, to discuss the question of offering inducements to new railroads to come to that city, it was decided to go ahead and bond the city to help the Northern Pacific to build their road to that point. The people of that place don't propose to be stood off any longer by promises from the Manitoba road. We are glad to see them take a decided stand in this matter and hope that they will stand firm. They cannot hope for anything from the Manitoba road. Supposing they did get the shops to what extent would it benefit them? It would not give them cheaper freight rates. By all means get a new road.

On Saturday evening a pleasant surprise party was given to J. C. Mathews at his residence. It was a complete success and the ladies and gentlemen who composed the party indulged in dancing and other amusements to their entire satisfaction. Refreshments were served and all present had an enjoyable time.

Fertile Journal.

Fertile school is crowded these days and the need of a larger room becomes apparent.

There was a pleasant surprise party at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Kankel last Thursday evening.

Miss Dora Engelstad has now so far recovered from her late sickness that she is able to be up and around again.

Charles Olson, who has been in the employ of Ole Vraa for several years, had his feet severely frozen recently necessitating the amputation of one foot at the instep and of several toes of the other foot. Dr. Nelson has charge of the case.

A ripple of excitement was caused last Friday morning by the burning out of the chimney of Dr. Nelson's residence. The evening of the same day the main chimney of the Fertile house burned out. About half a barrel of salt was thrown down the chimney, when a pail full would have been sufficient to attain the object sought, to stifle the fire. The high wind of that day made such fires particularly dangerous.

The weather during the past two weeks has assured a good ice crop.

Wednesday's storm was an out-and-out blizzard, the wind blowing at the rate of 40 miles an hour.

Z. M. Hunt has sold his farm of some 350 acres to Edward O'Connor, of Grand Forks, Dak., for $10,255. Mr. Hunt will give possession at once, and contemplates going to Washington Territory on a prospecting tour.

Chas. Wisner, formerly of Grand Forks and recently of this city, but now in business at Thief River Falls, was arrested early last week by U. S. deputy marshal Shepard, charged with selling liquor to the Indians on the Red Lake reservation. He was taken before Commissioner Ives, and the case continued until the 30th inst. There must be some mistake regarding this charge. Charlie would never do such a thing. Perhaps he gave liquor to the Indians, but we will not believe that he sold it to them.

Gentlemen Farmers.

American Farm News.

Those who farm for love of the business or for recreation rather than for the purpose of making a living, are often slurred and sneered at by those who could learn many lessons from these same "gentlemen farmers." The following from the New York Evening Sun concerning the agricultural pursuits of William Rockefeller, the Standard Oil magnate, shows that he would have made a success of farming or anything else to which he chose to put his hand.

"The most successful gentleman farmer in this city is not a member of the aristocratic farmers' club. That society is composed of such grangers as William M. Evarts, Chauncy M. Depew, William K. Vanderbilt, and they meet once a year over Delmonico dinner to tell how many thousand dollars they are behind in their efforts to raise prize beets, pumpkins and cattle. If Mr. William Rockefeller had not coined a colossal fortune out of oil he certainly could have made a competence as a farmer. His farm in Connecticut is a model, and, unlike most model farms, it makes money. It is on a sightly plain in the northern part of Greenwich, and in respect to stone walls, hay and grain crops, waving corn, even slopes, flourishing kitchen vegetables, it is as cleanly and beautiful as the best landscape gardner could develop it. On this same farm, before Mr. Rockefeller bought it, the antediluvian farmer barely scrubbed along with a living, and as he now looks upon the superb hay field, for instance, he does not think that his own meagre crops therefrom were his own fault, but ascribes the splendid yield to the fact that everything that Mr. Rockefeller touches turns to gold. The hay field is 18 acres in extent, and it has just yielded 80 loads of as fine hay as ever was cured. A few years ago one-third of this amount would have been regarded a handsome crop. Mr. Rockefeller knows to a cent precisely what it cost to raise and cure this hay, and figures out a handsome profit, although much of the hay will be used to feed his fine stable of horses.

Just so with the other crops. Everything raised pays, and even the vegetables for his own table, which are fresher and better flavored than any that can be bought in the market, are cheaper. He does not eat peas, as Sedator Evarts once said he did, that cost him $5 a peck to raise. Mr. Rockefeller's farmer says that the reason of the success of this farm is that the same business principles are used in running it as characterize the colossal corporation of which Mr. Rockefeller is the head. He gets up at 5 o'clock in the morning, gets fresh air and clear head and mental recreation on the farm, seasoned by the reflection that it is making money for him.

Cost of Raising Wheat 100 Years Ago.

Says a writer in the New York Commercial Advertiser: Two dollars is a round price for wheat—even September wheat—yet less than a hundred years ago it could not have been grown for that money. For then America had not a binder, a reaper, nor even a finger-cradle; the reap hook was the harvest implement. The harvester gathered his left hand full of wheat and cut through it with a smart blow of the sickle, dropping the swath orderly behind him. After him came a boy who gathered the handfulls into bundles, and after him a smaller boy—the band dropper—who left with each armful a band which had been made by the men too old for severe labor by knotting together the heads of two strands of about a dozen wheat stalks each. Then came binders and shockers, and after the grain was cured it was either stacked or hauled to the barn to await a convenient season for threshing. This the best farmers accomplished with flails upon a threshing floor, but the bulk of them trod out their crops by riding horses round and round over the heads spread in a ring upon beaten earth. Then it was winnowed dropping from a height upon a windy day, then carefully washed, dried in the sun, picked over by the hand as the housewife now picks rice, and sent to mill to make flour that was only eaten upon high days and holidays. No wonder the old-time darkies styled it "Billy seldom" in opposition to "Johnny constant," the every-day corn bread, or that among people of primative race flour bread is to this day "English dough" in contradistinction to the "Indian corn" that needs so much less of preparation.

Holsteins versus Jerseys.

Ed. Holstein-Friesian Register: The Live Stock Record & Farmer, of Kansas City, recently republished an article on "Milk and Butter," written by Mr. A. L. Crosby, who, we hear, is a prominent breeder of Jersey cattle in the State of Maryland, and who never allows an opportunity to pass, if he can help it, without saying something to the discredit of the Holsteins. This gentleman has undoubtedly been very much annoyed because the Holsteins have taken the prizes away from the Jerseys in nearly all of the butter contests that have been made between these breeds at agricultural fairs and dairy shows. In the article referred to the writer makes the following statements:

"In these days it is not a wise dairyman who keeps a cow for milk and beef. Why? Because the cow that is equally good for beef or milk has never been produced. Why, again? Because the cow cannot or at least has not been bred that is capable of profitably converting all her food into milk at one time and at another into beef. Still why? Because the milk and the beef traits, characteristics, temperaments and form of the animals are entirely distinct. Another reason why the beef cow will not pay as a milch cow is that, even supposing she would give as much and as good milk as the milch cow, the expense of feeding all the extra weight, the beef points, is too great to leave sufficient margain of profit to compete with the milch cow, with her frame built especially to give milk, and just enough meat on it to enable her to do good economical work. For instance, suppose a cow only weighs 100 pounds more than is necessary to do her work; if she began work at two years of age she has been carrying, and she has been feeding that 100 lbs. of meat for sixteen years. Now that 100 lbs. of beef will bring, perhaps, $2, what has it cost to feed it for sixteen years, and would the owner think he was well paid if he sold it for $2? I think not!"

The writer of the above seems to be ignorant of the fact that the largest animals are not always the largest eaters, or the smallest animals the smallest eaters; on the contrary, it is often the case that large fleshy animals are much smaller eaters than small animals that are not fleshy. The same is true of large or fat men and women, you will generally find thad men weighing from 250 to 285 lbs. consume less food than those weighing from 135 to 150 lbs. I think as a rule, that fat people are smaller eaters than lean people. Mr. C. seems to think that because the Jersey is a small cow, and capable of making a large amount of butter, that she must necessarily be a small eater, and that a Holstein cow, which is a large animal, and makes a large quantity of milk or beef, is necessarily a large eater. As a proof that one of the most noted of his favorite Jerseys is not a small eater we copy the following from an article in the October issue of the National Live Stock Journal:

"Our old readers will remember that when a report was given of the food eaten by the famous Jersey cow, Princess 2d, during the week when 27 lbs. 10 ozs. of butter was made from her milk, it showed the butter to have cost thirty cents per pound, and that from the quantity of food consumed, as reported by her attendant, she should have produced twice as much butter. The ration supplied for her was sufficient to furnish the food of support for three cows of her weight, and from these more butter could have been made during the same time."

Now this famous Jersep cow, Princess, 2d, it is said, has made the largest butter record ever made by any cow, and from this report it seems that she is an enormous eater, and that the butter that she produces would hardly sell for enough, to make value, to pay for the food she consumes. The fact is some of these small Jersey cows consume more food daily than some 2,400 lbs. Holstein bulls do.

Mr. C. says, "We want very little water in the butter cow's milk and not near as much water in the milch cow's milk as some of the Holstein breeders have succeeded in putting there. Who would want to try to sell in a Pennsylvania city the milk of the Holstein cow, that gave over 30,000 lbs. of milk in one year?"

The object of this statement is evidently to throw discredit on the Holstein breed of cows, the fact is, the analysis of the milk of this famous 30,000 pound cow, made by two distinguished chemists, goes to show that it was not so inferior in quality as Mr. Crosby would like to make it out to be for it was rich in fat and caseine, and again the famous 26,000 lbs. Holstein cow, Clothilde, at the New York dairy show in 1887, won the prize over all the Jersey cows, in the quantity of butter made, showing clearly that Holstein milk is not much inferior to Jersey milk.

The truth is whether we keep cows for milk or butter or cheese or beef a large quantity of milk is a valuable acquisition in a dairy cow. The Holstein milk in particular is rich in caseine and other properties that make it valuable for raising calves, pigs and even children, aside from the butter received from it. In the western states the raising of calves for beef steers is one of the profitable results of keeping dairies, and it is desirable to have a breed of cattle that can be made profitable fore either milk, butter, cheese or beef, and the Holsteins seem to fill the bill better than any other breed. They are beating the Jerseys for both milk and butter and cheese, and all know the Jerseys are of little account for beef.

It is a well known fact that a milch cow of whatever breed, unless it be the Jersey, will, when she goes dry, lay on fat very readily. The food consumed while being milked that was converted into milk and butter is, when the cow is dry, readily converted into fat and packed away among the muscles and tissue of the body, instead of in the butter tub.

There is one thing certain that whatever the regulations in regard to selling milk may be in Pennsylvania cities, that any man who has a family of young children growing up who will make the experiment of feeding those children first on the richest milk of the Jersey cow for one or two months, and then for the same time on the milk of even the 30,000 lbs. Holstein cow, that there will be no further demand for Jersey milk in that family for feeding children. The children will flourish well on the Holstein milk, while they will not on the Jersey milk that has too large a per cent. of oily matter. A child will starve on butter or cream, but will live and flourish on milk. Butter contains over 65 per cent. of carbon, and children do not require much carbon, and very young children should not use food containing much, if any more than is found in Holstein milk.

Mr. Crosby will have to try again before he rules the Holsteins out of either the milk, butter or beef markets.

Is There any Safety in Farming.

The Prairie Farmer.

Bradstreet and Dun get but little revenue from farmers. One of the rarest things seen in the farm-house is a copy of the report of either of these houses. The man who follows live-stock growing prudently, is not likely to see his name in either of these reports; while he who grows grain for sale may get there, even though this be done with a fair show of prudence. Why this disparity? It very naturally grows out of the economy of live stock growing having advantages the other cannot possess. For instance, the investments made in machinery alone, made necessary to carry on the growing of small grain, have been the last straw on the camel's back with many a farmer. Then, when we add to this the extra help required out-door and in, we have two items that do not impede our progress at every step, if the product of our acres is gathered in upon the sur face where grown, and the manure dropped where the beasts tread.

Financial failures among farmers are of comparatively rare occurrence. There are a few who have ventured beyond their depth—have entered the arena of speculation—buying live stock to ship; and, when this has not been bought wisely, disappointment comes in, as the market at which it comes his turn to sell, is reached. The country now is full of grain and bullocks; but, when we consider how steady the drain upon these stocks is, in our own cities and manufacturing districts, and how Europe is constantly reaching out for our produce, it should not be hard to realize that so far as our grains are concerned, what is not consumed in the regular way, is partially lost in transit—is at the bottom of our lakes lost in squalls, or sunk in mid-ocean. These mishaps annually swallow up not a little of our produce, and in a degree, explain why and how the products of our farms are so soon absorbed. Thus, statistics, a few years ago, made the following showing during nine months of a given year. The grain lost in the Atlantic alone during the period named, in transit between this country and foreign ports, amounted to 1,800,000 bushels. Taking a fair average of the amount of grain grown upon Western farms, it will be readily seen that the produce of a good many farms would be required to replace this lost. So, as it is certain that a soil made up of sand alone will absorb the rain-fall of to-day, it is equally certain that the products of our acres last year will early disappear, to give way to the products of the present year.

A consciousness that remuneration was accruing as the consideration for the extra time put in at farm labor, especially when this is employed in the growing of small grains, would somewhat lighten the tedium of this labor. The man who plans rightly for growing live-stock has no occasion for looking ahead to days of great weariness, and equally great hazard from the action of the elements upon small grain crops, necessarily "out in all weathers." We have previously, in these columns, referred to the great difference in risk incurred between the exposure of live stock, and small grain in the growing state, to storms of rain and wind. In the one case there is likely to be entire immunity from harm, while in the other a growing crop may be destroyed in an hour.

It is not often that farmers strike balances learning thereby whether they are or are not making any profit from the branch of farming pursued, whether this be the growing of live-stock or grain. It is not entirely, true that it is more difficult to keep farm accounts that shall be entirely true and reliable, than in some other lines of business. Yet, when provided with stock-scales, and the weighing of live-stock is followed up with system and care, it is within the possibilities to know quite accurately what surface of pasture grass or how many bushels of corn have been utilized in producing a given gain in the weight of a bullock or other farm animal. Equally so is it possible to correctly estimate the cost of growing an acre or a hundred acres of wheat or other grain, and when we have charged these latter with labor of every sort, in-door and out; comparing this with the greater ease with which we can profitably use up the product of a given number of acres in grass, having live-stock thereon; we will be prepared to answer this question. "Is there any safety in farming?" and will also be able to say with what class of farming this safety rests.

Our Future men

Western Rural,

What shall we do for our boys? The boy is the father of the man, and the father is largely what we make of him. There is no queston at all that the management of the boy is as interesting and important a subject as any that we ever have to consider. We are all interested in the welfare of our boys, and that interest is frequently manifested by the inquiry, How shall we keep the boy on the farm? The average conception of the ultimate happiness of the boy is to keep him on the farm. It is possible, however, that the farm might be about the worst place on earth on which to fasten him. He may not be smart enough to make a farmer and would do far better as a lawyer or banker or in some other business in which clear cut check is more valuable than a fine intellect. But upon careful thought we believe that it will be admitted our management of the boy is not very intelligent. We do not consider the details and carefully weigh consideration. Now the question as to what we shall make of the boy is not asked and answered once in a thousand times, with a clear view of all the conditions. The boy is too often left to make his own choice, and he is likely governed by considerations that are not all practical. He may want to be a lawyer because he thinks it is an easy life and a money-making business. He looks longingly toward the city because of its dash and excitement. Certainly it is our business to stop him in any course that he may choose, if we are convinced that it is not the best course. Outside of a choice of business we do not permit him to do as he pleases unless he pleases to do right or what we regard to be the best for him. If we gave the boy half as much thought as we devote to our stock and other business affairs, our future men would show a much grander development.

What shall we do for our boys? There is much to do for them which we have not space to mention, but we desire to call attention to the desirability of early recognizing the boy's individuality. He is too often a nonentity on the farm and everywhere else. He is given the idea that he is not his own, but that he is the property of his father, doomed to listen to the word of command until he is twenty-one years old. He lives all these years under bonds—lives practically the life of a slave. Yet he is a free, independent American—as free as his father, and the father has no proprietorship in the child whatever. It is the parent's duty to exercise authority when the good of the child demands it, and he has no sort of right to play the tyrant under any circumstances. What shall be done to recognize his individuality develop manhood than to give people, young or old, an opportunity to do something for themselves. The beggar has little manhood. The prison or the almshouse weakens manhood rapidly. But the industrious person, doing something for himself and reaping the reward of his labors, feels like a man and acts like a man. The boy should have an interest in some part of the farm—in the crops, or some crop, and in some of the stock; and whatever his interest is, should be absolute. The income from that interest should be his, to do what he likes with. The father can advise, but never should dictate. As the boy grows older increase his interest, and it will be found in the majority of cases that that boy will develop into a farmer as naturally as a colt grows into a horse.

The home of the boy should be made bright, and his surroundings pleasant. If the child is charmed by the beauty of the lawns and the dooryards of the village and of some of the cities, and longs to enjoy such things, it is a sad commentary upon our management at home. We have much greater opportunity for such ornamentation than they have in the village and the city, and there is not one single thing that is desirable in the city home, that we cannot have in the farm home, if we will. Perhaps the father is just as well satisfied with an ill-kept dooryard and with an inferior team and carriage and with the absence of musical instruments, etc., as if he had all these things in first-class shape, but the boy is not. The blood of youth courses in his vains, and one of the highest duties of the father is to keep his own blood young, and at least to make a show of entering fully into the feelings of the boy. It is the stiff old hearts that do vast injury in this world, and the heart ought not to be allowed to get stiff or old; and we can all do much to prevent it becoming so. The hair will get gray and the brow will become wrinkled, but we can keep the heart fresh even when way up in the years. This is another profitable subject for discussion in farmer's meetings.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., FEBRUARY 7, 1889.

Through the kindness of Senator Holmes we are enabled to present the full text of his seed grain bill as follows:

A BILL.

An Act to furnish seed grain for distribution in certain counties afflicted by frost or blight during the season of 1888, to provide for the payment thereof, and to authorize the board of county commissioners of such counties to issue bonds for the payment thereof.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota.

SECTION 1. It is hereby made the duty of the county auditors respectively of the counties of Wilkin, Otter Tail, Hubbard, Becker, Clay, Norman, Polk, Marshall, Kittson, Beltrami and Wadena, or any other county in the State of Minnesota, wherein the crop of the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight (1888) was partially or wholly destroyed by frost or blight, to give notice, before the 15th day of February A. D. 1889, to the respective town clerks, of the several towns of said counties, to post notices immediately in at least three (3) of the most public places in each town, to all persons wishing to avail themselves of the benefits of this act to meet at the town clerk's office in the town, or at the county auditor's office in the county wherein the applicant resides, and file with said town clerk or county auditor on or before the first day of March A. D. 1889, an application duly subscribed and sworn to by the applicant before the said town clerk or county auditor.

Said application shall contain a true statement of the number of acres the applicant has plowed and prepared for seeding for the ensuing seasons crop; how many acres the applicant intends to have plowed and prepared for such seeding before seeding time; how many bushels are necessary and of what kind of grain to seed the ground so prepared, and also that said applicant's crop was in the year 1888, entirely destroyed by frost or blight, as the case may be, or if only partially destroyed, the extent of such destruction and how many bushels of each kind of grain the applicant harvested in said year 1888, also what amount of said grain, and of what kind the applicant desires to borrow from the state; that the applicant has not procured and is not able to procure the necessary seed grain, and tha the desires the same for seed grain and for no other purpose, and will not sell or dispose of the same or any thereof.

Said application shall also contain a true and full description of all real and personal property owned by the applicant, and the encumbrances, if any, thereon, and the full description by government subdivisions of the land upon which the applicant intends to sow said seed grain.

SEC. 2 The town clerk of each town shall on or before the first day of March A. D. 1889, forward all applications made before him to the county auditor of his county, who shall file the same in his office. All applications filed in any county auditor's office under the provisions of this act shall be open to public inspection, and no applications shall be considered by the board provided for in section three (3) of this act, except such as have been made and filed within the time and in the manner prescribed by section one (1) of this act.

SEC. 3. The board of county commissioners of each county where the provisions of this act are applicable shall be and are hereby constituted and appointed a board of examination and adjustment of the applications for seed grain under this act, and it shall be the duty of said board to meet at the county auditor's office on the fifth (5th) day of March A. D. 1889, to examine and consider separately each application as provided in section one (1) of this act, and to decide who are entitled to the benefits herein mentioned and the amount to which each applicant is entitled, and said board shall on or before the 9th day of March A. D. 1889 forward to the governor a statement giving the number of applicants, the number of acres prepared, or to be prepared, and the number of bushels of each kind of seed grain needed in the county.

Said statement shall comprise and include only such Applications as have been approved by said board, and shall be signed by the chairman of said board, and countersigned by the county auditor.

Provided no one applicant shall be allowed a greater amount in value of seed grain than one hundred and fifty dollars ($150.00.)

SEC. 4. The governor upon receipt of the statements as provided in section three (3,) of this act, if the same shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000.00,) appropriated for such purpose, shall apportion and distribute the amounts called for to the several counties for which applications are received, but if the amounts applied for shall exceed in the aggregate said sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000.00) then the governor shall apportion and distribute that sum to the counties applying, pro rata in proportion to the amounts called for by said counties respectively, as shown by said statements of the county auditors thereof, and thereupon the governor shall inform each county auditor of the amount apportioned to his county, and shall authorize the board of county commissionery to purchase seed grain to the amount so apportioned, and cause the same to be distributed to the applicants in said county, who are entitled to receive the same under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. Immediately upon receiving notice from the governor of the amount apportioned to their county the board of county commissioners shall meet at the county auditor's office and readjust the applications in their county for seed grain, and apportion the amount that has been allowed to the county among the applicants pro rata in proportion to the amount required by each, if there shall not be sufficient grain to supply all in full.

PROVIDED: That after all applicants for said grain in any county are supplied, if there shall be a surplus the same shall be sold by direction of the board of county commissioners, and the sum received therefor shall be turned over to the county treasurer, who shall give his receipt therefor, and said sum shall thereupon be by him paid over to the state treasurer, who shall receipt for same to said county, and endorse said amount so received on the county bond of the county making such payment.

SEC. 6. The county auditor of each county shall, as soon as the county commissioners shall have performed the duty prescribed in section five (5), issue to each applicant an order for the number of bushels of each kind of seed grain which has been allowed to said applicant.

PROVIDED, however; that said order shall not be delivered until said applicant has signed a contract in triplicate, attested by the county auditor, to the effect that said applicant for and in consideration of * * * * bushels of seed grain received from the state, promises to pay the State of Minnesota, * * * * dollars, the amount of the cost of said seed grain; that said sum shall be taxable against all the real and personal property of said applicant; that such tax shall be levied by the county auditor of his county and collected as taxes against real and personal property are collected under the laws of the state, and that the sum so levied shall be a first lien upon the crop of grain raised each year by the person receiving said seed grain, until said amount is fully paid.

SEC. 7. It shall be the duty of the county auditor of each county to cause the tax provided for in section six (6) to be levied against the property of each person receiving seed grain under the provisions of this act. One-half of said tax shall be levied in the year 1889, and the other half shall be levied in the year 1890, and all monies collected by the county treasurer of any county under the provisions of this act shall be kept separate from other state and county taxes, and shall be paid over to the state treasurer.

SEC. 8. The contracts provided for in section six (6) of this act shall be numbered consecutively by the county auditor, one shall be filed in the office of the county auditor, one shall be transmitted to the state auditor and filed in his office, and the third shall be filed in the office of the town clerk of the town where the applicant making the contract resides.

The county auditor shall keep and transcribe in a book to be used for that purpose only, said contracts and a correct list and schedule of the applications giving the names of each applicant, the number of his application, the date of his contract, the cost of each kind of seed furnished to him, the description of the land occupied by him, and showing also the total amount of money furnished to said county by the state.

A true copy of said list and schedule so transcribed, shall be made and signed by the chairman of the board of county commissioners and certified to by the auditor, and forwarded to the governor; and whenever the amount provided for in any contract, filed under the provisions of this act, is fully paid the county auditor is empowered to cancel such contract and he shall write the word satisfied opposite the name of such person in the book in which said contracts are entered, and shall deliver up said contract to the person entitled thereto.

SEC. 9. Upon the filing of the contracts provided in section eight (8) of this act, the State of Minnesota shall acquire a just and valid lien upon the crops of grain raised each year by the person receiving said seed grain, to the amount of the sum then due to the state upon said contract, as against all subsequent creditors, purchasers or mortgagees in good faith or otherwise, and the said filings of said contract shall be held and considered to be full and sufficient notice to all parties of the existence and extent of said lien, which shall continue in force until the amount covered by said contract is fully paid.

Each and every person who has received seed grain under the provisions of this act shall as soon as his crops of the years wherein payment is to be made under his said contract are harvested and threshed market a sufficient amount of grain to pay the amount then due on his contract, and the same over at once to the county treasurer of his county which payment shall satisfy said lien for that year.

SEC. 10. Any person or persons who shall contrary to the provisions of this act, sell, transfer, take or carry away or in any manner, dispose of the seed grain, or any part thereof, furnished by the state as provided in this act, or who shall use or dispose of the said seed grain, or any thereof, for any other purpose than that of sowing or planting his ground, or who shall sell, transfer, take or carry away, or in any manner dispose of the crop, or any part thereof procured by the sowing or planting of said seed grain, with the intent to defraud the state, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof before any justice of the peace shall pay a fine of not less than ten dollars, nor more than one hundred dollars, or be imprisoned in the county jail for a term not less than ninety (90) days, and shall pay all costs of prosecution, and whoever under any of the provisions herein shall be found guilty of false swearing shall be deemed to have committed perjury and shall suffer the pains and penalty of that crime.

SEC. 11. It shall be the duty of the supervisors, constables and town clerks of towns, and the commissioners, sheriffs and county attorneys of counties receiving aid under the provisions of this act, having knowledge of any violation of said provisions to make complaint thereof to any justice of the proper county, and said justice shall thereupon issue a warrant for the arrest of the offender and proceed to hear and determine the matter in issue in the same manner as provided in other cases, and every person convicted under the provisions of this act shall stand committed to the county jail until his fine is paid, provided such imprisonment shall not exceed ninety (90) days.

SEC. 12. The county commissioners of each and every county receiving aid under the provisions of this act are hereby authorized and empowered to issue the bonds of such county to the State of Minnesota for the full amount of the aid received by such county, which bonds shall be made payable on or before four (4) years from the date thereof, and shall be signed by the chairman of the board of county commissioners, and countersigned by the county auditor, and sealed with his seal.

Said bonds shall be delivered to the state auditor before the aid contemplated by this act is furnished by the state.

All payments made by the county treasurer to the state treasurer as in this act provided shall be endorsed and credited when made, on the bond of such county.

SEC. 13. If the said bonds are not paid before the year in which the same becomes due, the county auditor of the proper county shall at the time of making the annual tax levy for such year, levy an additional tax upon all the taxable property of such county for an amount sufficient to pay the sum then remaining unpaid on the bonds of his county, said tax to be levied and collected as other county taxes.

SEC. 14. The county auditor shall receive as compensation for the services imposed upon him by this act two (2) per cent. of the amount received for taxes for this purpose each year, to be paid out of the county treasury, as the salaries for county officers are paid.

The county commissioners shall receive as compensation for the services imposed on them by this act, mileage and the same rate per diem for the time actually and necessarily occupied by them as is provided by law for their services as county commissioners, to be paid out of the general county funds.

Provided said county commissioners shall not be entitled to receive pay for more than six (6) days in all.

SEC. 15. That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000.00) be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any monies in the state treasury, not otherwise appropriated for the purposes of this act.

SEC. 16. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

MORTGAGE SALE.

[First publication Jan. 3d. 1889.]

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two thousand three hundred ninety-three and 25-100 dollars ($2,393.25-100) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Robert Houston and Evelyne M. Houston, his wife, to The Merchants' National Bank, of Crookston, bearing date the 23d day of March A. D. 1888, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 14th day of April A. D. 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m., in book "22" of mortgages, on page 231, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, That by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Fifty (50) feet off the east side of lot twenty-three (23.) block two (2.) in Hurlbut's Addition to the townsite of Crookston, according to the plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, for Polk County, Minnesota, also lot five (5.) in section thirty-two (32.) township one hundred any fifty (150) north, range forty-six (46) west, containing thirty-four and 50-100 acres according to the government survey thereof, in Polk County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said county and state, on the 23d day of February, A. D. 1889, at ten o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises and fifty dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

President Lincoln's Temperance Record.

A few years ago, says the Union Signal, we spent a month in Springfield, Ill., examining authorities on state history. Very naturally, there, in Lincoln's home, we came across many reminiscences of him. Among these were facts concerning his temperance record which greatly interested us and will interest our readers. Among other things, we found a copy of the first public address Lincoln ever delivered; we were surprised as well as pleased to find that it was a temperance speech. It was delivered in Springfield on the occasion of a Washingtonian celebration, February 22d, 1842. Commencing with a tribute to Washington, he said: "This is the anniversary of the birth of Washington; we are met to celebrate the day. Washington is the mightiest name on earth—long since mightiest in moral reformation; brightest in the cause of civil liberty. On that name a eulogy is expected. It cannot be. To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it."

From this he glides naturally into his subject—temperance. After enumerating the grand principles established by the Revolution, he adds: "But with all these glorious results, past, present and to come, it had its evils, too; it breathed forth famine, swam in blood and rode in fire. Long after its close the orphan's cry, the widow's wail continued to break the sad silence that ensued." He then proceeds to show that in the war against King Alcohol, worse tyrant than King George, no such dire consequences follow; its victories dry the orphan's tears instead of causing them to flow; instead of making widows, they restore to wives who were worse than widowed, husbands who were worse than dead. He closed with an appeal for total abstinence, and for crushing the drink traffic, which in power and pathos prefigured his Gettysburg speech.

When we consider the time and the circumstances under which the young lawyer spoke, in the Capital City where to-day few public men dare stand for temperance, this speech is certainly remarkable. The fact that he was chosen to deliver the address on this occasion proves that his temperance sentiments were even then well known. Nor was this the only time he spoke upon a temperance platform.

We have a pleasant account of Lincoln signing the pledge. A personal friend of Mr. Lincoln told Mrs. Lucy Rider Meyer, president of the Chicago Missionary Training School, that Old Uncle John, as he was called, an itinerant temperance lecturer in southern Illinois nearly two generations ago, on one occasion, speaking in an isolated country district, probably in the school house, offered the temperance pledge, as was his custom, at the close of his meeting; whereupon a tall, lank, awkward youth came forward and affixed his name. Years after, when he had come to great renown, Abraham Lincoln, meeting Uncle John, said to him: "I owe more to you than to almost any one else of whom I can think, for if I had not signed the pledge with you in my years of youthful temptation, I might have gone the way a majority of my old comrades have gone, which ends in a drunkard's life and a drunkard's grave"

His conduct when receiving notification of his nomination to the presidency is a part of history. A friend, knowing that he never kept wine in his house, and thinking it an absolute necessity on so great an occasion, had some in readiness to present to the committee who formally notified Lincoln of his nomination. But Mr. Lincoln quietly set it aside and, ordered a pitcher of water and glasses, filled them and passed them to his guests, saying: "We will drink to the fortunes of our party in the best beverage ever brewed for man."

The Australian System.

Grand Forks Herald: The following is a brief abstract of the Australian system of voting: "All ballots are printed at public expense, the cities and counties paying for the same. The distribution of the ballots to the voters is by the same agency. The candidates are all printed on one ballot, with sufficient margin at the right of the name of each candidate for the voter to designate his choice by a cross mark (X) or by filling in the name of the candidate of his choice in a blank space provided therefor and marked with a cross (X) opposite thereto. A voting shelf, or compartment must be provided for at every polling place in which voters may conveniently mark their ballots, and while doing so be screened from the observation of others. In the Massachusetts law there is a shelf provided for every seventy-five voters qualified to vote at each particular polling place. The voter receives his ballot from an officer of the law and not from a "striker." It does away with all workers at the polls and by providing that it shall be unlawful to peddle tickets or handle them in any way, and by the further provision that there shall be no workers within a hundred feet of a polling place, there can be little undue influence over the timid or poor voter."

A Splendid Life.

Western Rural.

The Rural from time to time mentions kindly the lives of men who have lived and died among us, if they have been what the world calls successful. But in doing so, it often regrets that there is so much in some of them that is to be regretted. A man may achieve wealth or fame and the world would think a newspaper false to its calling if it did not speak of the achievement as that of a successful man. Yet the life of such a man may have been very far from useful to the world which it was intended to benefit. But there are times when the pen is not able enough to do justice in singing the praises of the dead, though the life that has gone out may never have been marked by energy and enterprise in money getting or fame achieving as we usually interpret fame.

There died last week in Chicago a man whose life had been a cloudless sun to the world and of inestimable blessing to the race. He was not rich. He did not belong to the class that exerts influence because of its inherited position. He was a common yet an uncommon man; he was poor yet possessed the most precious riches, a knowledge that he was doing what he could to lift up his kind. This man was Andrew Paxton who conceived and established the Citizens' League for the Prevention of the Sale of Liquor to Minors and Drunkards. His whole life had previously been spent in the work of rescuing men from the vice of intemperance and in teaching the children to avoid this terrible ruin. He was born in England and coming to Chicago he was deeply impressed with the utter recklessness of the liquor traffic in this great city. As he gave more and more attention to the subject, he discovered that liquor was being sold to thousands of children who were crowding our prisons in consequence. He called a meeting of those who he thought would be interested in the subject, and proposed the organization of the league which has accomplished so much good in Chicago, and has leavened the whole country with similar leagues. After various disappointments and by the exercise of a superior energy he finally succeeded in establishing the agency for saving the children. With two other gentlemen he called upon the mayor to solicit his co-operation. The mayor listened with interest and finally said: "Gentlemen, since I have been in this office the liquor interests have been constant in their demands upon me, but you are the first persons who have ever called to ask that the traffic be curtailed or even made to obey existing laws." The then mayor and all subsequent mayors have aided Mr. Paxton in his work, and, to be short, he has performed a splendid mission. In the years that he was engaged in this mission, he has saved thousands of children, and become a power that the liquor traffic feared. From being repeatedly assaulted by the violators of the law, they actually came to respect him, and such a life as his is worth living and such a memory is a precious legacy to friends and family.

Window Glass.

Western Rural.

Now it is a window glass trust. We can get along without binding twine, but would puzzle us to get along without window glass. We can refuse to buy twine, but although we might stuff old coats and pantaloons in some of the windows, it would not be practical to stop them all in that way, and it is not tasteful to decorate any of our windows in such fashion. The trust has, therefore, got us unless there is some way to get the trust; and there is. There is not a trust in existence to-day that cannot be bursted if the people will make noise enough about it, and if the noise is not too discordant. If we will all whoop against trusts' combination at one time and in one key, it will be found that the courts will find law enough to explode the trusts. The courts are finding enough law now, though thousands of our people are quiet as the dead, depending upon others to make the necessary noise, even if they think enough about it to deem noise necessary. The Rural believes in noise. When the wind blows blows a hurricane everybody will think of the wind and they will wonder if the gale will pass without doing damage. Whenever the American people or any other people become noisy in their demands for reform, it is astonishing what quantities of dormant law the courts will dig out of the musty law volumes. It requires a long time to awaken our people, a fact that the history of the country plainly teaches, but one that many people do not appear to comprehend. But the American people have never been known to go backward very far. They may temporarily take a few steps backward but they will take two forward to compensate for it sooner or later. There is consolation, great consolation, in that historical fact. But we need to get firmly lodged in our minds that all this trust business is unlawful; that it violates a principle of law as old as law itself, viz: that it is against public policy to prevent competition. Having the law, therefore, we need only a concentrated, well developed, well understood public opinion back of it. The voice of the people needs to be heard in favor of enforcing the law. We want more noise.

It is astonishing how much one man may do in advancing reform movements. If a man believes in a movement, and never permits an opportunity to pass to advocate it, the movement will ultimately succeed; if a man is even so persistent as to win for himself the title of crank so much the better. He will soon make cranks of all his neighbors, and the "crankism" will spread until everybody will be cranks, and reform will be acomplished, and then the cranks will be philosophers, humanitarianns, patriots or some other species of taue nobility. If all our Alliances and Granges, and a good number of our farmers—we do not even need a majority to accomplish the result—will talk against trusts, the trusts will go much sooner than they otherwise will, though they are bound to go sometime even under a considerable degree of lukewarmness on the part of the people. As the result of agitation we shall have additional legislation against trusts, as they have in Iowa, and although that is not absolutely necessary, it helps.

Mis'taken and Real Kindness.

American Farm News.

Is there anything so unlovable, so really despicable as a thoroughly selfish person? The child who wants everything it sees for its own self, whether anyone else has anything or not; the boy who plays ball while his father does the "chores;" the young man, who comes to the dinner table after a morning spent taking his comfort in his own sweet way, complains there is no water at hand, and waits impatiently while his mother hurries to the well, draws the water, carries it in, pours out a glass full and hands it to him; the daughter who is too delicate to do dirty drudgery, leaves that to the parents she is ashamed of, but is not above spending the filthy lucre they earn thereby; the eight-hour man, with the sixteen-hour wife, who allows her to get up and make the fires in the morning—we don't admire any of them, and hope such cases are not frequent, and yet condemn it as we will, it is a fact that selfishness is the ruling trait in the disposition of the majority of people.

It there are any unselfish natures in the world, they belong to the mothers, and they make it up by training their children to an extra amount of selfishness. Not intentionally, oh, no! but certainly accomplishing this end nevertheless, and the pity of it is that they do so through their own beautiful, but blind, unselfishness.

"I do not want my children to work," said a mother of a large family when remonstrated with for making herself such a slave to her children and not training them to help her. "They will have to work soon enough," she said; "I want them to have a good time while they can. As long as I am able to do for them I shan't ask anything of them." Oh, the folly of it! Not only leaving them unprepared for what she herself admits is sure to come to them, but also teaching them to hate work, starting them out in life with the ruinous idea that good times may be had only by those who need not work. And aside from these considerations for the future, even for the present her policy is a failure; for a more discontented, unruly, selfish set of children it would be hard to find. And, though she does not see it, and perhaps would not believe it were one to tell her, the older ones are already forming acquaintances and habits the most hurtful, because they have no occupation and consequently no interest at home.

An old woman is at this moment passing my window; slowly she walks, bowed down by the weight of years and sorrow. I know her and her sad story. She is going now, not "over the hill to the poor house" exactly, but about town to say good bye to her lifelong friends before leaving for a far distant town in the west where lives a brother who has written that she may make her home with him, since he has heard she is not welcome with her own children though they have used up all her means that ought to have made her comfortable the rest of her days. And the poor old soul is very thankful for this refuge though she feels the shame of it keenly that, as many children as she has here all of them well-to-do, they let her go all that weary way, though they know she is timid of traveling and has a horror of going among strangers, not one of them will offer a home to the dear old mother who has spent her life for them. They have not even the excuse that she is hard to care for or to get along with as many old persons are. Her's is one of the kindest, sweetest dispositions possible; always patient, cheerful, and helpful. She was always so self-sacrificing and self-denying. We used to live near neighbors to them and if ever there was a faithful wife and mother she was one. There was a very large family and she did all her own work and kept them all at school, never denied them anything that her hard work and close management could get them. Her whole being was almost absorbed in the care of them, their comfort, their happiness and their amusement made her whole life. And in sickness, I never saw such a good hand to wait upon the sick. They had a good deal of it in their family, often several would be down at once. How she hung over them day and night and many times in the face of everything against them and even when the doctor had given them up. She would stay by them and bring them back to life and health just by strength of will and love, one might say. And that this is the return she gets for it all, it seems too hard. Yet, through my indignation at such children and my sympathy for her, will come the thought she trained them to this. It is really her own fault. You may make what you will of a child but it is just what the man or woman will be.

Another family I have in mind, one of the happiest I ever knew, where the children, from the older boys and girls counted nothing else such a pleasure and honor as an opportunity of helping papa or mama. Yet not a word of command, hardly of request, was ever heard. But always kind words of acknowledgment and thanks for even the smallest service. The parents, by studied tact, led, instead of trying to force their young minds in the ways they wished, by commending in general terms desirable traits, and condemning the wrong, in conduct of persons coming under their observation, and in books carefully chosen, read and discussed in the family. But above all, by their own example. Always treating each other and their own parents with kindness and courtesy. Any one of those children would have considered it a shame to sit still and see either parent do any task that it was possible to do for them. They were never allowed to do work beyond their strength. But all the many little duties that most foolishly fond mothers do for their children they were allowed to do for themselves and each other. These parents understood that service begets love; in other words the more we do for a person the more we care for them, and wisely share the pleasure of loving service with their children. They foresaw that when they came to old age, they could not expect kind consideration from their children if they taught them from infancy to think only of self—care only for their own comfort.

To see these children as they came in from school in the evening, (they lived in the country and carried their dinners,) cheerfully greeting mama and baby. The oldest boy's first question: "Father hasn't come home yet, has he? Shan't I hitch up and drive to the station for him? He'll be tired, I know, after his long day in town, and the half mile will seem two to walk." The mother smiles her consent and he hurries away. The girls put away their own and Tom's wraps, books and baskets (for Tom is in a hurry to get in his wood and kindling and the feeding before father and Charlie get back.) Then changing their school for house dresses pleasantly offer their assistance to mama, who as pleasantly accepts and arranges the program. One shall go with her to milk, the other get the supper, and ten-year-old Bess is made proud and important with the privilege of tidying up the sitting room with baby Marguerite for assistant. Yes, even the baby picks up her own blocks and is coaxed to be washed and brushed, with the promise that she may get papa's slippers for him, for this beautiful spirit of helpfulness is very contagious. Then to see them when they have all gathered at the supper table, so happy to be all together after the day's separation, each full of thoughtful kindness for the others; and later, when by their united efforts everything has been cleared away, the evening work all done and preparations made for the early morning's meal. There is still a long evening to enjoy together for in this family each one works till all is done. They don't allow mother to work far into the night in the kitchen, while the rest take their ease. They stay by her, for they want her with them. By their assistance she gains time to be a companion to her boys and girls. And such an evening as they have! with mother the center of attraction and father seconding all her efforts for instruction or amusement, and each child offering his mite for the general entertainment; each self forgotten in the happiness of others. It was the most beautiful picture I ever saw.

The Binding Twine Outrage.

The Western Rural.

Allowing for the selfishness of human nature, and forgiving men for much because of natural weakness, it is time to draw the line when a combination is formed among those who are already engaged in a financially profitable robbery of farmers, to simply fleece them alive. The price of binding twine was crowded up last year until a decent man was ashamed of the soullessness of men. It would seem as if there should be enough respect for the foundation industry of the country, even among thieves, to prevent men from deliberately scheming to rob the farmer of every dollar he can produce. But we have long been face to face with the fact that those who supply the agricultural classes with what they need, never intend to loosen their grip of their own free will. This proposed binding twine outrage is one of the most flagrant injustices that has ever contemplated, and there is no other way to meet it than to take the animal by the horns heroically and twist off its head. We can get along without binding twine for a season, and if we do, there will never be another binding twine trust as long as the world stands, and the price of twine will never again be as high as it has been. Not only that, but one season's refusal to buy twine will show the power of farmers to protect their own interests to an extent that will spread demoralization among other classes of robbers, and set them to trembling.

So far as we have been able to hear from wheat growers, they gladly enter into the plan announced by The Rural last week, to cut the wheat and stack it loose. It will pay to endure the little inconvenience which may result, and the net profit will be as great under any circumstances, as it would be if we paid twenty cents a pound for twine. The Rural will do all it can to awaken a union of action in this matter, and hopes to hear immediately from those who will enter upon this work of throttling one pernicious robbing trust. If our readers will make an effort to win supporters to the plan in their immediate neighborhoods, and other farm papers will heartily enlist in the work, for once we can array the farmers with a solid front against as grasping a scheme as man ever contemplated.

Detroit Record: It beats the world. Let a drunken bum come into town to work the "directory" racket, and he will be patronized by nearly every business man in the place, and especially by those who think that "advertising don't pay," and never have a card in their local paper. They will pay this migratory chap from five to ten times as much money as the printer who is interested here, and spends his money here, would charge for the same job, and then congratulate themselves upon the splendid advertisement they have secured, and so cheap! The cards are printed and put upon a hotel door, and sometimes (not often) read by the traveling public who come here to sell, not to buy goods. A single line in a local paper, is worth more to a man who has goods to sell than an advertisement the size of the entire hotel door. The paper goes into the home of the very people whose patronage is invited—city and country—every part of the county. What business do merchants derive from runners who stop at hotels, and how many guests at hotels stop to read advertisements tacked up in their rooms? Such far-sightedness is enough to give one the jim-jams.

Hallock Weekly News: Capt. H. W. Donaldson was on deck last Tuesday evening at the meeting of the Hallock Temperance Society and delivered a spicy lecture on the subject of temperance during the course of which he offered a neat solution of the liquor problem. While he is a radical so far as his views upon the subject are concerned, he was satisfied, from past experiences that the ultra radical was not the proper mode of dealing with the vice. That masses of the people are not yet sufficiently educated up to those high sentiments of morality and sobriety requisite to make radical legislation on the subject effectual. That the best mode of dealing with the traffic was by restrictive measures. He had given the subject a great deal of thought and while it might be a new idea to his listeners and one that might not receive the approbation of those engaged in the promotion of the cause of temperance, he believed that the ultimate solution lay in placing, the entire traffic in liquor in each county, into the hands of the county commissioners, to be sold by agents appointed by them for that purpose, and only by the bottle and for cash. To sell at a profit of one hundred per cent and the net proceeds of all sales to be used in furnishing, equipping and maintaining comfortable and hospitable reading and lounging rooms and libraries in each village in the county, where the young men of the village and all men of leisure may resort for amusement, or to read papers books etc., or for pleasant chat with friends, and where the farmer may find hospitable reception after a cold drive in the winter. Speaking of the ultra-prohibitionist who are claiming for prohibitory legislation. Capt Donaldson said that we had absolute prohibition, in law, one day out of every seven, referring, to the Sunday law. Do we enforce it? Ninety-nine out of every hundred saloon-keepers in the state violate that law every Sunday with impunity. It reminded him of the parable of the talents. He to whom one was given buried it lest he lose etc. We should be very careful that the one talent we now possess be not taken away from us and added unto the six given to the saloon-keeper.

Building and Loan Association.

Western Rural: The necessity of State supervision of building and loan associations was always apparent enough, but is more so now than ever before, in consequence of the discovery of the perfectly rotten condition of a collapsed Chicago concern. Our readers are not as much interested in this matter as the people of the towns are, but there is at least one building and loan association of national pretensions which is bidding for a more general patronage than any such association has ever essayed to do. One of its representations to investors is that it is loaning on Western property and getting much higher rates than Eastern associations do. It is possible that its operations may, to some extent at least, reach farmers, and that possibility makes the attempt to supervise these institutions of interest to our people. There are millions of dollars deposited with these institutions, and they need to be looked after by the government as much as banks do.

School Laws.

Western Rural: The Illinois General Assembly is setting a good example so far as introducing bills to amend our school laws is concerned. There are few people who realize how loose our school laws are and how easily taxes may be increased under them. School officers can build new school houses, buy sites and pay exorbitant prices for them, and change text books pretty nearly at will. The school elections under the present Illinois laws, are too expensive. Bills have been introduced to remedy these defects. It is sought to prevent the building of a new school house unless a respectable number of the voters ask for it; the attempt will be made to provide free text books, and to limit the polling places at school elections to a thousand voters at least. Large towns and cities are more interested in these reforms, or the majority of them, than the rural districts are but economy is a matter in which we all are interested. It is in the right direction.

Joe Lusian has been very much under the weather for a number of days.

Sam. McBride, Jim Sheasgreen's foreman, was down from the woods Saturday.

Miss Nellie McAvoy has accepted a position as teacher of the school in Gentilly.

Hay seems to be a drug on the market this winter. Slow sales at $3 per ton.

Miss Julia Anderson was visiting in the city last week, the guest of Mrs. A. J. AnDyke.

Saturday was the livliest day of the season about the city. The streets were fairly alive with teams.

Judge Christianson went down to the saintly city last week to attend a meeting of the Probate Judges of the state.

A large pane of glass was broken from the door of the clothing department of Fontaine & Anglim's store, Saturday.

Mr. McLauthlin, who has been singing in the M. E. church for a number of days, has gone to Ada, where he will assist Rev. Nicholson in a series of meetings.

D. A. Darby, the well known wheat buyer, of Kittson elevator, is a good deal of a sleigh maker, as may be seen by gazing on that pung, which is both comfortable and handsome.

Crookston's headquarters at St. Paul, the Clifton Hotel, has been well patronized this session by members of the Third House from Polk County. By the way, the Polk County boys know a good thing when they see it, and show their good sense by patronizing the Clifton, the best hotel for the money in St. Paul.

All who feel interested in the growth of our country should write our senator and representative urging them to vote against the bill to forfeit the Duluth & Winnepeg land grant. Also urging them to favor a bill granting an extension of time. Upon these bills depend the early building of the road.

The practice of tying a team, by the lines, to a sled stake, in such a way as to prevent a runaway, sometimes resorted to by careless teamsters, is liable to bring about disastrous results. A team left in the way described came very near throwing themselves, on Main street, Saturday, and were saved only by the adroitness of a bystander, who released the lines.

Last Saturday, a certain man of this city was driving out with a team of Bronchos, when they broke into a run. Everything went well till the neckyoke broke, letting the pole down into the snow, where it soon stuck fast, causing the sleigh to overturn and throw the driver to the ground. Being determined to hold that team, our hero held to the lines and finally succeeded in stopping them, although he was dragged a distance of one hundred yards before it could be accomplished. A boy who was in the sleigh when it went over, had his chin cut, but not seriously.

Capt. H. W. Donaldson was down from Kittson County on Saturday and dropped into our den to talk drainage and kindred subjects. The Captain attributes the severe losses last fall directly to the lack of drainage, and is in earnest in his efforts to secure this important work at once. He says the appropriation asked from the state should be made available and used at once, and the balance of the work provided for by county boards. We think he is right about this, as the work cannot be done too soon for the good of the country. The amount of money required to be used, if it could be expended during the coming summer, would help things out wonderfully, and be worth more to the country now that any future time, probably.

From the Thirteen Towns we learn that Samuel Hanson committed suicide at his residence in the town of Brandsvold, a week ago last Monday or Tuesday, by shooting himself in the head. He was found, last week Thursday, in a sitting posture on his cellar floor, with a rifle between his legs, the muzzle of which was in his mouth, and to the trigger was attached a string, which he had evidently pulled, discharging the rifle. The whole upper part of his head was blown off, and from the position in which he was found, it was evident that death was instantaneous. Coroner Shepard was notified and arrived on Wednesday's train, but decided that an inquest was unnecessary. The deceased was a single man, 28 years old, and was of a quiet disposition, having few acquaintances, and was in fairly good circumstances. The cause for his rash act is unknown and it is presumed that the deed was done in a fit of insanity.

In State's Prison.

On Saturday, February 2d, in company with clerk of court, E. M. Walsh, we had the pleasure of visiting the State's prison at Stillwater, and were shown about the institution by an accommodating official. Everywhere we found evidences of good management, the prison in every part being as neat as wax, and the prisoners looking as contented as incarcerated human beings could look. The kitchen is a model of neatness, while the long rows of cells look as if their inmates vied with each other, each striving to keep his little house in better order than his neighbor. Some had their cells carpeted and hung with neat pictures, tastefully arranged on the walls. Notable among the improvements instituted by warden Stordock is a ten-candle electric light in every cell, affording a better and a cheaper light than before. Since the contract system ceased, the warden has commenced a work of great importance to the state, that of building staying walls for the support of the rear walls of the prison enclosure, which affords the inmates needed exercise for two-thirds of the time. This work will have to be done, and if done in the way the Warden proposes, will cost the state very much less than in any other way, and will help to solve the problem of how to employ the prisoners, as the work will require two years to complete, and during that time a factory could be put up sufficient to give the prisoners employment. The prison has a capacity for 600 prisoners, and now has 425. After having looked over the institution and thus got a more exact idea than could otherwise be gained, we are firmly of the opinion that our legislature should not return to the contract system before it gives Warden Stordock's plans a trial. We are convinced it would not only be better for the prisoners, but far better for the interests of the state. The only reason that we can see for returning to the contract system would be to furnish a good thing for some contractor, but the best interests of the state would be subserved by the adoption of Warden Stordock's plans.

M. G. Peterson, of the town of Garden, went down to St. Paul for medical treatment last week. The physician pronounced it a bad case of catarrh, but thought he could fix him up again all right soon.

Adolph Gallasch is spending a short time on a visit to friends at Red Wing and other southern Minnesota cities. Gallasch has gone out of the patent medicine business and will give his whole attention to banking.

C. J. McCollum and P. H. Konzen came down from Hallock on Saturday evening to meet with the incorporators of the Crookston, Duluth & St. Vincent R. R. to talk over matters in relation to the new line of road. If the people of Marshall and Kittson Counties would co-operate with this new corporation they could secure a new road.

It may be a matter of consolation, in these stringent times, to know that, if there is any difference it is in our favor. Everywhere, all over the United States, times are harder than here and money harder to obtain. With the prospects before us of a good price for wheat next fall farmers and business men should take courage and aid one another until the good time comes.

The Committee Resolves.

At a meeting of the committee, appointed by the mass meeting on January 15th, to look after the city's interests in relation to railroad matters, held at the office of Montague & Wight, on Saturday last, the committee unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

Whereas, The citizens of all that portion of this state north of the Northern Pacific railroad, have been earnestly striving for many years to secure the construction of the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad, from Duluth in a northwesterly direction to the Red River Valley, and then to the northern boundary of this state, west of the Lake of the Woods, and to that end obtained from the legislature of this state, in 1878, a grant of swamp lands to aid in the construction of such road within ten years thereafter; and

Whereas, About five miles at the east end of such proposed railroad was partially graded during 1881, but, owing to the fact that substantially all of said region, east of the Red River Valley and west of Duluth was, and ever would be, unfit for cultivation, the capital necessary for the completion of said road could not at that time be obtained, notwithstanding said grant of swamp lands, and in consequence thereof the work on said road was then suspended; and

Whereas, During the year 1888 capital was secured sufficient to construct twenty miles of said proposed road and twenty miles thereof was, during that year, completed, inspected by commissioners appointed by the Governor, and found to be constructed so as to be a first-class railroad in every respect; and

Whereas, The parties who so resumed prosecution of said enterprise are able, ready and willing to go on and build said proposed road in case the legislature shall grant reasonable extension of time, and shall so legislate as to insure said proposed aid, and render said enterprise safe and reasonably profitable; and

Whereas, A bill has been introduced in the legislature to enforce forfeiture of said aid, and the passage of such bill will render it impossible to secure capital required to complete said road, and will leave said region wholly undeveloped for many years to come, and therefore retard and permanently injure all the northern part of this state; now, therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this body that the passage of such forfeiture bill would prove a great public misfortune and a direct blow to the prosperity of the Red River Valley, as well as to the city of Crookston, and that it would effectually prevent the settlement and development of all that portion of this state north of the Northern Pacific railroad, east of the Red River Valley and west of Lake Superior, for a great many years to come; and

Resolved further, That it is the sense of this body that the early completion of said proposed road would open to settlement and development all of said region and bring into market, not only the lands belonging to this state, but also the lands belonging to the United States, and thereby largely increase the taxable property and revenue of this state to an amount far in excess of the value of the proposed aid granted.

Resolved, further, That it is the sense of this body that passage of the forfeiture bill would be an unjust discrimination against the northern part of this state in every point of view, contrary to public policy.

Resolved, further, That the Secretary of this body cause a copy of these resolutions to be presented to the legislature of this state, and that strenuous effort be made by all public-spirited citizens of the northern part of this state, to impress on the members of the legisture, not only the importance of defeating said forfeiture bill, but of passing such affirmative legislation as shall be necessary to secure investment of capital required to build such proposed road at the earliest practicable date.

At the council meeting, on Tuesday evening, every member being present except Ald. Childs, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Whereas, A bill has been introduced in the Legislature of the State of Minnesota to enforce forfeiture of the grant of swamp lands made by this state to the Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad to aid in the construction of its line, and the passage of such bill will delay and endanger the building of said railroad and retard and permanently injure the northern portion of this state.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this City Council that the early completion of said road would be of great benefit in particular to the Red River Valley, in this state.

Resolved, further, That it is the sense of this Council that the passage of said forfeiture bill would prove a great public misfortune, and that it would be an unjust discrimination against the northern part of this state, through which said road is intended to be built.

Resolved, further, That the city clerk cause a copy of these resolutions to be presented to the legislature of this State, and send a copy to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives from this district; and we earnestly request our representatives in the legislature to do all in their power to prevent said forfeiture bill becoming a law, and to work for such affirmative legislation as will secure the building of said Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad at the earliest practicable date.

Minneapolis Evening Journal: Henry Ransom, a former employe in the county treasurer's office, has been arrested on the charge of obtaining money on false pretenses. He represented himself as in the employ of the county and visited the houses of property-owners and demanded from $2 to $5 claimed as due on back taxes. In most cases he was successful.

Ransom was for a time employed in the register of deeds office in Polk County.

From the action of the city council, and the citizens' committee, and from personal intercourse with prominent citizens, we are led to the conclusion that our people are very much in earnest in their request to their representatives in the Legislature to oppose the passage of the Duluth & Winnipeg forfeiture bill, and to urge legislation favorable to that road. They feel that the road would be of incalculable benefit to this country, and woe be to that representative who should have the temerity to misrepresent them by opposing their wishes in these particulars. We send our representatives to the capital to transact business for the people, and not to set themselves up as judges for the people. Their business is to do as they are directed, and not to decide what is best, and woe unto that man who shall have the effrontery to oppose the will of the people in this particular, for they are now very much in earnest, if they never were before. They request their agents to aid the D. & W. road, and their request is not couched in ambiguous language—it is too plain to be mistaken.

Marshall County Leader: A child suffering from diphtheria should be isolated from the first, and kept so for about three weeks after convalescence begins. The air of its rooms should be saturated with antiseptics; and under the physician's directions every possible chance of the poison being conveyed through the nurse into other rooms of the house, or elsewhere, should be prevented. Every identical thing which has been in the atmosphere of the sick-room should be thoroughly disinfected before it leaves it. As to how to prevent children from acquiring the disease other than by exposure to an infected person, the only way is to provide for them the best hygienic conditions. To make home healthy is the first step to take in prevention. Overcrowded tenements should be vacated. Wherever one is, he should make sure that the drainage system is perfect and that his quarters are kept scrupulously clean. Perfect ventilation is, of course, imperative. If a child is much in the open air, it is less likely to take cold easily, and that colds render children more liable to take diphtheria must be always kept in mind. If satisfied that errors on their own part—lack of cleanliness, imperfect ventilation, etc.—are not accountable for its unhealthiness, then they should move to other quarters without delay.

Let everyone understand that if diphtheria enters their homes, they will be almost always to blame for it. When the responsibility is placed where it belongs, and people feel it, then there will be but comparatively few cases of this much dreaded disease.

Northfield News: It is the experience of pulishers that too many people are apt to think it matters but little whether the newspaper bill is promptly paid or not,—that is a small sum, and is of little consequence. This is not because subscribers are unwilling to pay, but rather because they are negligent. Each one imagines that because his year's indebtedness only amounts to a small sum, the publisher cannot be much in want of it, without for a moment thinking that the income of a paper is made up of just such small amounts and that the aggregate of all subscriptions is a very large sum of money.

The Duluth Road.

Solicitor Warner states the Position of the Road to the Railroad Commissioners—350 Miles Additional Track is required—An Increase of Capital.

St. Paul Dispatch.

Solicitor Warner, of the Duluth & Winnipeg road, was before the railroad commissioners this afternoon and spoke in support of the application of his road for an increase in capital stock from $5,000,000 to $8,750,000. The articles of the association, Mr. Warner said, were granted in 1877, permitting them to build a road from Duluth to the boundary line between the Lake of the Woods and the Red River. They commenced building under the expectation of enjoying the state swamp land grant of ten sections per mile. They found that such a grant was doubtful. The construction of the road began in 1880, but on account of discouragement, they were compelled to stop building for a short time. They now propose to finish the construction of the road, but they find that many changes are necessary, all of which help to increase their expenses. A lower grade must be made than formerly decided upon; a better grade of rails must be used, and the line must be increased in length within this state by 350 miles. The Duluth terminal facilities they find will cost some $2,000,000, and taking into consideration that the swamp land grants are doubtful, the road makes a petition that the articles of the association may be amended accordingly. Unless it is so granted, Mr. Warner claims that the road must be constructed on a less expensive plan, and, in fact, he fears that it will be impossible to obtain means for building, unless they have the power of issuing stock and securities to the amount of $45,000 per mile.

Napkins were never intended for saws or ropes; to use them upon the face as though they were is an insult to the napkin.

When the babe is restless, a few teaspoonfuls of cold water have a quieting effect; and a cloth wet in cold water applied to the inflamed gums of teething children gives relief when other remedies fail.

It is worth the while to test the virtue of this simple remedy for seik headache:

Squeeze the juice of a lemon into half a glass of cold water and stir in a little baking soda; drink during effervescence.

Phthisi generally began at the apices of the lungs, because the bronchial tubes were so arranged that they carried the inspired air with greater facility to the bases than to the apices. During inactivity a person would ordinarily breath above 480 cubic inches of air in a minute. If he walked at the rate of six miles an hour, he would breath 3260 inches. In singing this increased more than in walking, as to sing well required all the capacity of the lungs. The instructor of vocal music, in addition to his musical education, should understand the anatomy and physiology of the respiratory organs.—New York Medical Journal.

To Wash Woolen Shawls.

Scrape one pound of soap, boil it down in sufficient water; when cooling beat it with the hand, it will be a sort of jelly; add three tablespoonfuls of spirit of turpentine and one of spirit of hartshorn. Wash the articles well in it, then rinse in cool water until all the soap is taken off, then in salt and water. Fold between two sheets, taking care not to allow two folds of the article washed to come together. Iron with a slightly warmed iron. Shawls done in this way look like new. Salt is to be used only where there are delicate colors that may run.

Five Ways to Stop a Cold.

1. Bathe the feet in hot water and drink a pint of hot lemonade. Then sponge with salt water and remain in a warm room. 2. Bathe the face in very hot watar every five minutes for an hour. 3. Snuff up the nostrils hot salt water every three hours. 4. Inhale ammonia or menthol. 5. Take four hour's active exercise in the open air. A ten grain dose of quinine will usually break up a cold in the beginning. Anything that will set the blood actively in circulation will do it, whether it be drugs or the use of a bucksaw. But better than all, if your cold is inveterate or serious, consult your family physician, and at once.

When "John" Took to Washing.

There are no laundrymen in China. No linen is worn there. The rich use silk and woolen undergarments, and the poor wear woolen and cotton. As starching and ironing are unknown, the female servants do all the laundry work. The reason of the great number of laundrymen here is that when the Union Pacific Railroad threw hundreds of Chinamen out of employment they cast about for something to do, and as there was a great demand for washerwomen, and a scant supply of them in the West, the Mongolian turned his attention to her trade. He learned it so quickly and so well that he stuck to it, and made so much money that the calling soon became popular. Gradually the laundrymen came East, and no city, and now few villages of any size in the whole country are without a Chinese "laundry."—San Francisco Call.

Vocal Music as a Preventive of Phthisic.

A suggestive paper by Dr. C. E. Busey of Lynchburg was lately read before the Medical Society of Virginia. He stated as a well-known fact that those nations which were given to the cultivation of vocal music were strong, vigorous races, with broad, expansive chests. If an hour was daily devoted in our public schools to the development of vocal music, there would not be the sad spectacle of the drooping, withered, hollow-chested, round-shouldered children. There was too great a tendency to sacrifice physical health upon the altar of learning. Vocal music was a gymnastic exercise of the lungs, by development of the lung tissue itself. The lungs in improved breeds of cattle, which naturally took little exercise and were domiciled much of the time, were considerably reduced in size when compared with those of animals running at liberty; and so it was with the human race, which led inactive lives from civilization.

Try Not to Cough.

A physician who is connected with an institution which contains many children, says: "There is nothing more irritating to a cough than to cough. For some time I had been so fully assured of this that I recently determined if possible, for one minute, at least, to lessen the number of coughs heard in a certain ward in the hospital of the institution. By the promise of rewards and punishments I succeeded in inducing them simply to hold their breath when tempted to cough, and in a little while I was myself surprised to see how many of the children entirely recoved from their disease.

"Constant coughing is presisely like scratching a wound on the outside of the body; so long as it is done the wound will not heal. Let a person, when tempted to cough draw a long breath and hold it until it warms and soothes every air cell, and some benefit will soon be received from the process. The nitrogen, which is thus refined, acts as an anodyne to the irritated mocus membrane, allaying the desire to cough and giving the throat and lungs a chance to heal. At the same time a suitable medicine will aid nature in her effort to recuperate."—Baltimore News.

The Magic Tree.

On a certain plantation, which it will be as well not to locate, there was a very large, hollow orange-tree which, according to the St Louis Post-Dispatch, had never borne any fruit, although it blossomed regularly every spring. After blossoming the blossoms would all gradually disappear and a small orifice on the end of the twig would be all that was left for the balance of the year.

This went on for a good many years, until one day the place was sold to a man from the North, who determined to cut down the tree and solve the mystery if possible. He accordingly had the tree cut down, and instead of finding a solid trunk he found nothing but a large outside shell of a tree, while the inside was perfectly hollow and was occupied by a large family of squirrels and a colony of bees. The bees and squirrels were very light in color and did not appear to have any eyes, and the oranges were elongated instead of round, although very sweet tasting, and otherwise appeared to be excellent fruit. The man was puzzled to account for the phenomenon, as there was no opening in the tree by which even the bees could get inside it, but the mystery was explained by an old colored man, who had been on the place many, many years. He told the following story:—

When the orange-tree was very small it was found to be growing hollow, and after it got to be about a foot thick the hole near the centre of the trunk was made larger and a limb grafted into it; the tree then did well, apparently, but had never borne any fruit. It is thought that the bees and squirrels had gotten into the tree and made it their home, and when the limb was grafted in their means of egress were stopped up and made prisoners. As bees are known to be very industrious the following will readily be believed:—

The bees would go out to the end of the twigs, which were also hollow, every spring and pull the blossoms inside, and thus get the honey by turning the flowers inside out; the oranges would then grow inside, and the twigs being small, account for the elongated shape of the fruit; the bees would live on honey and the squirrels on the fruit, and thus a colony of each was established, and lived in comfort and plenty on the inside of the orange-tree.

She Gained a Customer.

"I don't seem to find just what I want," said a lady to a clerk in one of the large Boston stores.

"I'm sorry," answered the clerk, politely; "perhaps another time we may have a better supply."

"Possibly," and the lady picked up her hand-bag and walked away, without even a word of thanks, although the saleswoman had been showing her laces for half an hour, and had taken down box after box for her examination.

"Well Helen," said a companion clerk, as the customer passed out of hearing, "if I'd been in your place I'd given the fussy old thing a snub; bothering so long and not buying after all!"

"I wish she had bought" said Helen, "but any rate I did my duty."

"Duty! yes, and very likely got a black mark from the floor-walker, for not making a sale. I detest shoppers!"

"But another time she may buy something. Who knows? So I tried to be polite to her, though it does seem too bad to spend so much time and sell nothing."

"Yes; and it shows so on your book," answered her companion. "You ought to have sent her off long ago. You might have sold to two or three customers, for we had quite a rush one while." A week later she came to the lace counter, and declining to be served by one of the other clerks, waited several minutes for Helen to get through with another customer. Then she asked to see laces again. Helen was attentive and courteous; the customer made a small purchase and went out.

"Sold again by Madame Fussiness?" said one of the other clerks, laughing.

"Not quite," smiled Helen; "and I hope she'll come again."

Within a few days she did come again; this time bringing a friend with her; and to Helen's great satisfaction both of them bought liberally.

When they had gone the floor-walker came to Helen and said:

"You've done well. That lady dressed so plainly was Mrs. S——. She's immensely rich, and awful fussy. Her patronage will be worth a good deal to the store. The superintendent shall hear how well you got on with her."

Patience and politeness had their reward, and it is to be hoped that the other clerks learned a lesson.

A Study In Still Life.

From the Indianapolis Journal.

The camera in the hands of a photographer has served many uses, but its value as a temperance advocate has never been fully tested. A few days since a couple of enthusiastic photographers, with an instantaneous pocket instrument a little longer than a saradine box, appeared at one of the city hotels and informed the clerk that they came to photograph a friend who had been taken violently drunk the day before, and who was still largely under the influence of the ardent.

Inquired of as the reason for wishing to make a counterfeit presentment of the vinous individual they said their object was to reform him by exhibiting to him, on his next occasion of sobriety, a picture of himself taken in an advanced stage of whiskey, and that this exhibit, thus made, would in all probability have the same effect upon him that the sight of a drunken woman had upon the Spartan youth— teaching him the need of moderation in his cups. The hotel people, at first disinclined to permit any copying from stil-life of the character referred to, were induced to relent and co-operate in the proposed reformation, and the expedition, including a reporter who was taken along to chronicle the success of a new method, proceeded to hunt up its proposed subject. There was no question of his fitness for that test when he was found. Like Marmion, he had fallen in mid-battle. One boot had been substracted, but the other remained, and as if to leave no doubt as to the means of his overthrow he had gone to bed with his hat on.

It required but a moment to supply the details necessary to make the picture effective. An American flag draped after the manner of a winding sheet, a few bottles and tumblers peeping out though its interstices, and the inscription, "We have given him up for gone," on a tag pinned to his collar, told the whole story. The instrument was leveled and sighted Snap! and with an instant's opening of the shutter-valve, the whole scene was perpetuated for all the time to come. If the victim does not reform when he gets his copy of that picture, there is no hope for him.

Humorous Points.

If there is ever a time in life when a man gets thoroughly disappointed it is when he persuades somebody to get him up a dinner of things he used to like best when he was a boy.

The Executioner Always Arrested.

From a London Correspondent.

The Spanish felon condemned to death sits in a chair; behind him is a stout post, to which are affixed two clasps of iron, which, when joined, encircle the neck. Through the post and back of the neck runs a screw. When this screw is turned the collar is tightened, and an iron wedge enters the neck at the base of the brain, which dislocates the axis, pierces the spinal cord and produces instant death.

As soon as the execution is over one of the police rushes forward and seizes the executioner, who is arrested and taken to prison, where the jurgado is still assembled. The executioner is denounced as a murderer. The judge asks him what he has to say in answer to such a charge, and he replies: "It is true that I have killed the prisoner, but I deny being the murderer, for, although I committed the act charged (displaying his arms with the badge), I did it in the cause of justice and in pursuance of the law, all of which I was compelled to do by virtue of my office." "The accused is innocent and is discharged," answers the court, and then the formula of the Spanish law is satisfied.

The creamery system has been a a potent factory in developing the dairy interests of the country, but with the system has come serious evils, among them being the quite prevalent notion that anything made at a creamery may properly be labeled creamery butter.

RICH GIRLS' PIN MONEY.

What Some of the Rich Papas Shell Out.

"I have only an allowance of $10 a week for pocket money," said the daughter of a millionaire in a confidential moment the other day. "Papa has such an idea of money, you know, and he thinks I am wildly extravagant to spend that small amount on candies, flowers, novels and theater tickets. Mamma orders all my clothing, you know, and so, of course, I do not have to buy anything that I really need."

To many a young girl $10 a week would seem sufficient for pocket money, and, indeed, how many hundred of pretty clever girls are there who cannot earn more than that amount even by working hard each day of the week? But the average fashionable society girl has so many demands on her purse that $10 does not go far.

It is said that Jay Gould very generously allows his pretty daughter $25, and with this she not only supplies her own little wants, but gives to most of the small charities.

Cornelius Vanderbilt and Elliot F. Shepherd allow each of their six children a certain amount of pocket money each month, and they are all required to keep cash accounts and present them to their papas the first of each month. The amounts are not large, and are given more to make the little millionaires understand the value of money than aught else.

Willie K. Vanderbilt's three children are allowed plenty of pocket money, but are fined heavily for all misdemeanors. They dine in a pretty little room adjacent to the great dining saloon and if a tiny drop of any coffee, milk or wine is spilled on the snowy cloth the offender is fined 25 cents for each offense. A glass of water knocked over or a dish let fell on the floor brings a fine of 50 cents to the culprit and all the fines go to the foreign and home mission.

"What do I do with $20 a week?" asked an only daughter of a Fifth avenue millionaire, when asked the question. "Well, not always the same thing. Last week I spent every cent of it on a lovely parasol, to carry at a coaching parade, and then after all my trouble it poured rain. I generally purchase my flowers—you know I must have a fresh corsage cluster of violets every day—and they cost a dollar a cluster.

"Then bonbons, soda, chocolate and those little trifles come to about $5, and a couple of matinee tickets, tea for my old woman at the Home for the Aged, new music and papers eat up the rest. I am fearfully short sometimes, and I draw in advance and forget to pay back, don't you know? Papa used to allow me so much every quarter for my wardrobe and maid, but I was always in deep water. Now I order what I want and have the bills sent to him."

"I do not think that the wealthiest New Yorkers are more than liberal in allowing pocket money to their daughters," said the principal of a fashionable up-town school. "My pupils are, most of them, daughters of millionaires, and yet they have seldom enough for their many little wants. It is wisdom, not meanness, on the part of the parents, I think."

The Women of Great Britain.

There are 3 million more women in Great Britain than men. Thirty-seven per cent of all the women of marriageable age in England are unmarried. Fully one-half of the women of the educated middle class—gentlewomen—of marriageable age are without husbands. Economy is the watchword of the day abroad. British fortunes are shrinking. Ways and means of contracting expenditure are every day topics in British papers. Estates will no longer stand the charges upon them involved in the maintenance of such a horde of maiden sisters. Women unused to lifting a finger for themselves are being thrown in over increasing numbers on their own resources. They have been brought up to no remunerative occupation. They have no business experience. They have no business ideas. They shrink with a painful sensitiveness from contact with a rough and tumble world. There are thousands on thousands of them.—Philadelphia Times.

A Confused Full Moon.

At the Western Union Telegraph office in Chicago they have an operator whom they call Moon, because he is full so often.

During a terrible electric storm recently he awoke from a placid doze to find the lightning clicking away at the instrument like fun.

Slightly confused from his potations, half conscious that a big rush of business had come, he managed to get his fingers on the transmitter.

Crash! came a thunderbolt.

"Don't send so fast!" gravely clicked Moon over the wire.—Chicago Ledger.

It Comes Near Bankruptcy

"What's the matter, Smithers—don't your books balance?"

"No. The expense side, thank's to my wife's dressmaker's bills, completely out weighes the income side. I tell you, Jones, marriage isn't exactly a failure, but it comes mighty near bankruptcy."

Moderate Work and Moderate Rest Keep a Brain Right.

Moderate work, alternating with moderate rest, gives a brain which, taking the whole life through, will accomplish the most and the best work of which a human being is capable. The brains are to be improved and developed by reasonable exercise and reasonable rest. The one is as essential as the other.—Once a Week.

Sewercide Was the Coroner's Verdict.

A ruby-nosed Bourbon from Rye Beach went head first through a Jersey City manhole one day last week, and he coroner's jury returned a virdict of "sewercide."—Drake's Magazine.

McMullen's Woven Wire Fencing.

In this issue is inserted for the first time the advertisement of the above named goods. Woven wire fencing is rapidly becoming the most popular fencing. Owing to the fact that the McMullen fencing has a twisted wire rope selvage, instead of a single wire selvage, and that it is made of the very best steel wire, galvanized before weaving, it is considered by stock men, railroad men and others to be the best article of the kind now on the market. Read their advertisement in this issue and send to them for circulars giving full information. They not only make the best woven wire fencing in the United States, but sell it at a lower price.

FOR THE BLOOD

S. S. S.

Swift's Specific has cured me of a malignant breaking out on my leg, which caused intolerable pain. It was called Eczema by the doctors—four of whom treated me with no relief. I candidly confess that I owe my present good health to S. S. S., which in my estimation is invaluable as a blood remedy. MISS JULIA DEWITT, 2227 N. 10th St., St. Louis, Mo.

Our baby when two months old was attacked with Scrofula, which for a long time destroyed her eyesight entirely, and caused us to despair of her life. The doctors failed to relieve her, and we gave Swift's Specific, which soon cured her entirely, and she is now hale and hearty. E. V. Delk, Will's Point, Texas.

Scrofula developed on my daughter—swelling and lumps on her neck. We gave her Swift's Specific, and the result was wonderful and the cure prompt. S. A. DEARMOND, Cleveland, Tenn.

I took a severe cold upon my chest and lungs and did not give it proper attention; it developed into bronchitis, and in the fall of the same year I was threatened with consumption. Physicians ordered me to a more congenial climate, and I came to San Francisco. Soon after my arrival I commenced taking Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil with Hypophosphites regularly three times a day. In ten weeks my avoirdupois went from 155 to 180 pounds and over; the cough meantime ceased. C. R. BENNETT.

JOHN A. SALZER, LaCrosse, Wis.

A THRILLING STORY.

The death of young Maurice B. Throckmorton, killed at Birmingham, Ala., Saturday night while entreating a mob not to attack the jail, recalls a story, says the New York World, as strange as anything in fiction—a story as full of dramatic scenes and incidents as anything that was ever produced upon stage, and which has been four times brought by a tragedy to the memory of those who disliked most to hear it.

It was nearly forty years ago that Maj. John Throckmorton, son of Aris Throckmorton, and uncle of the young man killed at Birmingham, was one of the leaders of the brilliant society of the old South. He was the finest type of the Southern gentleman: impulsive, generous, kind of heart and open of hand. He was connected by blood and marriage with every prominent Southern family from New Orleans to Louisville, and when he came back from college to live among his people the fairest prospect was spread out before him. He went in to enjoy life, and as he had ample means and was a welcome guest wherever he choose to go, time slipped by pleasantly enough.

Just when pretty Ellen Godwin came into his life no one ever knew. In all the fierce light that afterwards beat upon them their earlier intimacy remained forever buried in mystery, and both carried the secret to their graves. Ellen Godwin lived near Louisville, was remarkable for her beauty and the gentleness of her disposition. She was well connected and had a small fortune in her own name. Friends of Throckmorton saw them together for a time, and then suddenly their intimacy was discontinued. Throckmorton left Louisville on a pleasure trip and did not return for several months.

One stormy, blustering night in January, when the snow was beating against the window panes and the people were hurrying in to blazing fires, Throckmorton returned to Louisville and went direct to the Gault House, a hotel owned by his father. When he entered his room he happened to glance across the street. He saw a woman standing motionless beside a gas lamp directly opposite. She was dressed in black, and although he could not see her face, he recognized the outlines of her figure. She stood there so silent and specter-like that he became fascinated and watched her for hours. That was the first night that "Throckmorton's ghost" was seen.

It was the beginning of what was to last without interruption for twenty years. The dark shadow that night was to follow him all over the world; it was to be with him in the blaze of noon and in the darkest hours of the night; he was to see it in every capital of Europe; it was to be close behind him in his most secret moments; it was to mingle with his own shadow, so that in a delirium of terror he would wonder if his mind were not deserting him, and if both shadows were not one and the same. It was in vain that he tried to put oceans between him and his awful phantom-like pursuer; in vain that every resource of money was tried; from that first stormy January night John Throckmorton was never for one moment alone.

It was wonderful how she appeared to know of his movements. If he would suddenly decide to go to a party she would be standing on the opposite side of the street when he got out of his carraige. If he remained in his hotel for days, and if then, in the dead of night, he slipped out by a side entrance she would be close behind him. Her appearance on the streets become so common in Louisville that people merely glanced at her carelessly as she flitted by. As the years passed her name was forgotten and she was only known as "Throckmorton's ghost." Sometimes when she would be waiting for him children would gather about her and often boys would hoot and taunt her; but she never complained, and no man ever heard the sound of her voice.

The weather never appeared to inconvenience her. She often would stand for hours in the midst of a driving rain or hail without shelter of any kind, apparently oblivious to everything save the man she was following. She always wore the same heavy, black dress, with a black hat, and a thick, black veil, which concealed her face.

At first Throckmorton attempted to laugh the matter off. The woman was a crack-brained creature, who would grow tired after a time, he said. He could keep it up if she could. If it amused her he didn't object. Thus he reasoned at first, but soon became restive, and then it grew to be a deadly offense to mention the subject in his presence. At last he determined to go abroad. He made all his arrangements with the utmost secrecy, not even telling his most intimate friends, and did not rest until he had put the Atlantic between him and what had grown to be a horrible nightmare. He went straight to London, and the first person he saw when he had got off the train was Ellen Godwin. He fled to Paris and he thought he would lose her in the whirl of a winter in Parisian society. In a month he gave up in despair. She followed him to clubs and receptions and opera parties. Wherever he was, day or night, he could never look behind him without seeing her. He tried all the largest cities of the continent without avail, and at last returned to Louisville and again took up the old life.

He used to complain that he was chained to a corpse; that his life was blasted and that no man ever before endured such a persecution. No woman would suffer his attentions, and he soon gave up all idea of marriage. He grew more and more moody and at last determined to rid himself of his tormentor by violence. The scene resulting from this determination was most dramatic. One night about 12 o'clock as Thorckmorton was walking home through a lonely street, he glanced over his shoulder and saw his "ghost" a few yards behind silently following him. He waited in a dark alley until she came up and then suddenly sprang out on her. He snatched her veil from her face and dragged her by the throat to the nearest lamp post.

"Why do you follow me?" he asked, his voice trembling with passion. She made no reply, and, clutching her more firmly by the throat, he drew a dagger. She made no attempt to resist him, and just as the dagger was about to be plunged into her breast she cried out half choked and every instant expecting death. "Kill me John, but kiss me first." Throckmorton threw the dagger away, brushed the woman aside, and fled before he could be tempted again.

At length Throckmorton could stand it no longer, and Ellen Goodwin war arrested at his instance and tried for insanity. The old court house in Louisville, where Henry Clay and the Crittendens had many a hard-fought battle in the days gone by, was packed as it never was before or since. The most eminent legal talent was employed, and the evidence was of the most sensational character. Ellen Godwin was put on the stand and was given a most severe cross examination. Her answers were clear and intelligent, and after hours of closest questioning the opposing lawyers were forced to admit that they could make nothing of her. Poems written by her, essays and articles were read to the jury, and at last her lawyer, young Ely Parsons, arose to defend her. He was a man of commanding presence, a trained elocutionist, and a rarely gifted orator. For four hours he kept the audience entranced. He told, in all its dramatic details, the story of Ellen Godwin. He went over the scene of the midnight meeting and argued that the woman had simply been wronged and was seeking justice. He pointed to her wan, haggard face, her delicate frame and contrasted the wreck that stood before them with the beautiful, tender, gentle girl John Trockmorton had first met. His peroration was a masterpiece, and when he sat down the jury, without rising from their seats, found her sane. Then the lawyer and the client were borne away by the shouting thousands, and such scenes were enacted as were never before witnessed in that sombre old court room. A few months later Parsons was elected to Congress because of the speech. From the day of her acquittal Ellen Godwin never again followed Throckmorton. He left the city and died a few years afterwards, alone on his plantation in Mississippi, far from friends and relatives.

After his death Ellen Godwin grew weaker and weaker. The strength which had borne her up through all the years of her unexampled pursuit gave way. She wrote a full history of her life, for which a Chicago publishing house offered her $10,000. She refused the offer, saying the book should be buried with her.

One day she went to Cave Hill Cemetery, one of the most beautiful burying grounds in the world, just outside of Louisville, and told her sister, who had followed her through all the dreary years with a perfect devotion, that in one particular spot she wished to be buried, dressed as a bride, with the book containing all her trials and wrongs upon her breast. A week afterwards she was laid to rest there, and a little slab at the head of the grave tells the story of her most eventful life.

The old Man Had Changed.

Mr. Harry Furniss, the well known caricaturist on the staff of Punch, tells the following anecdote, which amusingly illustrates some of the troubles of the harassed portrait painter:

A man once called upon a portrait painter and asked him to paint his father.

"But where is your father?" asked he of the brush.

"Oh, he died ten years ago."

"Then how can I paint him?" asked the artist.

"Why," was the reply, "I have just seen your portrait of Moses. Surely, if you can paint the portrait of a man who died thousand of years ago, you can more easily paint the portrait of my father, who has only been dead ten years."

Seeing the sort of a man with whom he had to deal, the artist undertook the work.

When the picture was finished, the newly blossomed art patron was called in to see it. He gazed at in silence for some time, his eyes filling with tears, and then softly and reverently said:

"So that is my father? Ah, how he is changed."—Washington Star.

Immense Roost of Crows in Illinois.

For months past crows to the number estimated all the way from 1,000,000 to 3,000,000 have swarmed in the eastern end of Douglass County feeding in the fields in daytime, and collecting at night at their famous resort, 3½ miles northwest of Newman, in McCawn grove, some sixty acres. About dusk these birds gather in from the surrounding country in myriads, and the noise they make is deafening. Frequently they alight in such vast numbers on the trees that large limbs are broken under their weight. A black cloud of these birds was crossing the railroad track near here, when the smoke from the engine blinded them. They flew against the side of the swiftly moving cars, persons who watched the strange sight counted nearly 200 dead crows. A party of hunters from Hume armed themselves with shotguns and visited the roost. Six of them shot and killed 135 in less than two hours. Frequently, the birds would rise in such clouds that they would almost obscure the sun from view. They make sad havoc in the fields of corn, and it seems impossible to drive them out.

MISS THEE.

Come back to me, come back;
Thy presence loved I lack
Amid each hour of daily toil and care;
I mist thy sweet smiles light,
And in the lone, still night
I miss thy soft breath on the slumberous air.

The meadow where we played,
The wood-paths where we strayed,
Wear the chill gloom of my lone, shadowed life;
And with the vanished hours
Have paled the fragrant flowers
With which my youth and mid-life scenes were rife.

But Memory! how her gates
Swing back! how patient waits
Her beaconing sentry for my stumbling feet,
That tremblingly pace back
Footprints along time's track,
But thy dear self beloved fail to meet.

Along Hope's wreck-strewn shore
I seek bright gems of yore,
Thy fond, sweet smile and kiss, but find them never!
I miss thee, and I must
Till my soul, freed from dust,
Shall clasp thy soul, and hold thee fast forever.

A VALENTINE DONE IT.

BY FANNY FOSTER CLARK.

"I hadn't never oughter been alone woman; I warn't cut out for one," remarked Miss Parminter, who kept a little stationery shop, to Jane Miller, the dressmaker, who rented the second floor back. It was the 1st of February, the valentines had just come in, and it being evening Jane had time to stop down stairs and help in assorting them according to price and according to sentiment.

"Walentines always takes a holt of me," Miss Parminter went on. Listen to this:

'Oh, what is life without a heart,
To bear of all our joys a part?'

I've often felt that way myself.

'O maiden, seize the summer day,
Take love and sunshine while you may;
The hours grow dark, the way; grows cold,
And lovers come not when you're old.'

Lord-a-massy! but that's true!

'These little Loves 'twixt you and me
Bear tender words continually.'

And all them Cupids flyin.' What a lovely idee! Dear! dear! Now, Jane, wherever is them ten-cent ones? Put 'em in a pile to the left. Now then five-cent lace papers. So. Why, there's somebody comin' in. Sure's I live it's——. Now, Jane, them lace papers is all muddled up. Sure's as I live it's Mr. Eugene Brackett!"

The bustling old maid hurried to the front of the shop and gave a friendly greeting to the landlord's son, Mr. Brackett, a very good-looking young man. His skin was clear, his eyes were dark, his hair was black and curly, his eyebrows were cleanly marked, his nose straight and every hair of his moustache twisted in a proper twirl right or left. Is it any wonder that a little dressmaker, who had seen the world only from the rickety windows of the second floor back in a mean city neighborhood, should find her ideal in such coloring and such curves? Not at all, and Jane Miller's heart was filled with love and reverence as Mr. Brackett leaned on his walking-stick in a pose that made him look somewhat askew, but that was to Jane so bewilderingly graceful that Miss Parminter had to call out sharply: "Now, you air a muddlin' up them lace papers. Do take care."

"What's new in valentines?" asked the young gentleman presently, lounging toward Jane, and, after torching his hat, settled it perilously aslant over his left ear.

"Nothin' much," she answered, with a poor attempt at being unembarrassed.

Miss Parminter, following him closely, suggested:

"We thought you might have stopped in with some message from your father about rent or suthin', though dear knows me and Jane is paid up square."

"Oh, no," he drawled out; "I just called in a friendly way."

"Did you? Really! If we'd'a known that we,d'a been dressed up for you," with that distribution of emphasis entirely her own, and capable of conveying the most subtle shades of sarcasm or suspicion independently of the normal meaning of her words.

"Oh, I don't care for dress," said Mr. Eugene, watching Jane's homely little face, framed in its pale hair, and not looking at all pretty even with her evident emotion. "Dress is nothing, beyon'—here he pointed surveyed the poor girl's washed and turned and much-made-over brown merino—"beyond neatness."

Jane flushed and hid her face in a large box valentine, that, like a prophecy, represented a young man in full swallow-tail regimentals leading a veiled paragon of loveliness toward a most hymeneal-looking piece of architecture.

Miss Parminter began to busy herself spreading certain lengths of cotton cloth to preserve the "stock" from dust; and now and then she nervously fingered the wisps of her gray hair cultivated by the side of her face, and called by courtesy curls. This was a habit she muttered to herself at intervals: "What ever he is up to I wonder?" and by dint of keeping one eye and one ear on the young people, just as Eugene rose to go, she heard him say: "The Paramount will return in twelve months at least twenty times the investment."

"Is it—is it a silver mine?" asked Jane.

"Yes; in Nevada; im-mense."

"Could—could as little as five hundred dollars' worth be bought?" Jane ventured very timidly.

"Well," answered Eugene, with good-natur condescension, "we are only buying large blocks—a hundred thousand dollars at a time—for capitalists, "but," he added, in a low and tender tone. "I'll get you the five hundred dollars' worth, and you shall make your twenty thousand or more, my little Jeanette, with the best of them."

"How good you are!" exclaimed the dressmaker, looking up into his face with her large gray eyes. All this plain little woman's life was in those weary, honest eyes. They told of a poor, pinched childhood in their unsatisfied eagerness, of an early orphanage in their confirmed sadness, of hard work in their lack of luster and the premature lines about them. Since her 10th year—she was 26 now—she had been battling with poverty, sustained only by her industry, thrift, and a romantic longing after something more genial and more lovely than life had shown. By suffering positive privation she had contrived to put away $500—blood money every penny of it, wrung from a natural young heart that renounced every little dearly prized pleasure and luxury before the dread of coming sickness and want.

Brackett bent low over her slight, stooping form, saw the grateful tears in her cheeks; pressed for an instant the thin fingers, pricked and hardened by the needle, then whispered softly: "I'll see you again soon. Good night, little Jeannette."

Passing out he jostled the doorway against a great form that seemed little inclined to make way for him, and as Eugene walked down the street the form came into the shop and Miss Parminter greeted it with, "Hello, Josiah! real glad to see yer."

Josiah Jackson, plumber, owned those heavy shoulders, and owned the spare, square, low-browed face that looked out above them. It was a workman's face and it was a workman's form. Plumber was written all over him, from his dusty, matted hair to his stained hands and flattened thumbs that showed Josiah's "days off" were very few. He was skilled in his trade, and often called in as an expert in difficult jobs. Even now he was returning from some work of this sort.

"You're late. Josiah! said Miss Parminter.

"Yes," he answered, in rather a surly way. "I've been puttin' in extra time on one of Brackett's houses. By the way, what's his son doin' here?"

"Nothin' much. Fust I thought it was some message from the old man about collectin' rent, but turned out 'twarn't so."

"I guess not," said Josiah, contemptuously, and loud enough for Jane to hear. The old man wouldn't trust him with money. I've heard the two quarrellin' more than once. The father always says: You're a a big rascal, Eugene, and you shan't touch a dollar of mine. You've got your villainous broker's office, so play your tricks outside of my business.' He's a cheating scamp, that fellow."

Jane rose quickly and came forward. Two bright spots of color burned on her pale cheeks. Her eyes were flashing, and she said, facing Josiah indignantly, "Mr. Brackett's a gentleman, Josiah Jackson, and that's more than you are."

"Jane," the plumber answered, his voice shaking with anger, and yet with an appeal in it—"Jane I don't pretend to be. I'm only an honest man and that fellow ain't. That's all I've got to say."

"That's more than you've any right to say," the girl retorted.

"Haven't I no right," exclaimed Josiah, "to warn you for your own good when I see things is wrong?"

"You've got nothing' to do with me at all," answered Jane; and like a shabby little queen with a week voice, much out of keeping with the might of her scorn, she walked to the stairway at the back and passed to her own room.

Josiah looked after her; then pushing back his old hat with one rough hand that trembled strangely he turned to Miss Parminter, who was very busy with the wispy curls, and said.

"Look here, I've been courtin' Jane for more'n a year. She's give me a kind of a half promise more'n once, and now—now, within six weeks, since that Brackett's been loafin' round, she treats me that way. 'Tain't right, Miss Parminter, 'tain't right." His smudged and toilworn face quivered and grew pale.

"Well," answered the spinster, making new tangles of the curls, "you see, Josiah, Mr. Brackett's smooth-spoken and handsome, and, moreover, girls is girls. They like a little—well, what I call poetry ways and soft speeches; and girls likes it to be always valentine time, so. to speak."

"But 'tain't always valentine time, and soft talk won't keep the pot a-b'ilin," said the practical Josiah, the words losing half their coarseness in the dignity of their suppressed and genuine suffering.

"Ah," Miss Parminter replied, but the sensiblest of women has got a longin' after nonsense. We like being made much of in some way out'o the common. We like playin' we're queens or angels. 'Tain't no harm, brt sometimes it costs us dear. Why, just for a few nice words and a way of looking out of a pair of handsome eyes, I throwed over a fellow as good as you for a chap that jilted me after all. And here I'm a lone woman, and hadn't oughter been." She cried quite hysterically for a moment, then stopped to see what Josiah was slowly drawing from his pocket. It was a parcel, and he carefully opened it, saying:

"I've bought Jane a little present—a half a dozen pairs of good woolen stockin's, I thought they'd be more useful than breast-pins or such trash."

"What have I been tellin' you?" Miss Parminter broke out, in passionate oratory. "Stockin's!—stockin's,—indeed! Why, a rosebud or a picture card would have more effect on a girl. Put up them stockin's, Josiah, 'twon't never do—never!"

"All right," answered Josiah, bowing to a superior judgment, yet looking puzzled; "but stockin's is very useful, and we all have to have 'em,"

"Good gracious, man, I'm out of patience with you. Go home, and I'll manage your love making. Go home."

Josiah very meekly obeyed, and Miss Parminter closed the shop, and went up to Jane's room.

Those red indignant spots still burned on the little dressmaker's cheeks, and to the abrupt question, "Do you mean to give Josiah up? she replied, sharply, "You can't give up what you never had.

"But you were getting fond of him," Miss Parminter persisted. "Does Mr. Bracket come to see you often?"

"That's nobody's business."

"'Taint, except in so fur as I'm fond of you, Janey, and I'd like to see you turn out well."

"I expect to turn out well. I'm going to invest my money, and in a year from now, you dear old friend—for you are a dear old friend, and I do love you," exclaimed Jane, glad to find an excuse for tears—"I shall be worth $20,000, and we'll go shopping. Shopping! Think of it!"

"Look-a-here, Jane, what are you going to do with your money?"

"Put it in the Paramount Silver Mine. Eugene—I mean Mr. Brackett—will take care of it."

"Eugene are you going to marry him?"

"Yes; that is, n—no. Oh, Miss Parminter!" and Jane looked almost pretty and girlish as she kneeled down and hid her face against the angular but sympathetic shoulder—"oh, I think—I do think something's coming of it. He's been here three times, and he's asked me to call him Eugene, and he calls me little Jeannette in a gentle way that's just perfectly lovely."

"Humph! And how about Josiah?"

"I'm sorry" and she began to cry softly—"very sorry, but think of him beside Eugene!"

"I do and he is a heap sight more manly looking."

"He calls me 'Jane' and sent me a stuff dress at Christmas; Eugene calls me 'little Jeannette,' and see"—"—she pulled up her sleeve and showed, secretly worn, a small torquoise bracelet— "he sent me this."

"Yes," snapped Miss Parminter, and it's worth about five dollars. That dress was all pure wool, and cost every cent of twenty."

"It ain't cost so much," said Jane, twisting the bracelet about her arm, "it's—it's——"

"It's bosh!" Miss Parminter finished the phrase for her. "Oh, Jane, I know. All women crave bosh." Then the judicious old person quietly rose and went to her own room, where she sat for a long time fingering her curls and thinking.

In the morning she came to Jane in great distress and confusion, and begged her to take care of the shop, she being obliged to go out on business.

Miss Parminter was gone all day long. She carried her spare face and her bright bonnet and those wisps of curls in and out of a great many down-town offices, and on coming home at night walked straight through the shop and sat down, very sad and dejected, by a stove in the back. She looked most unhappy and buried her face in her hands. Jane hurried the closing up to find out the cause of so much sadness. When they were at last alone, the poor old woman moaned and rocked to and fro, exclaiming: "Such trouble, Jane; such trouble! I shall be ruined!" Jane manifested affectionate sympathy, but she only cried out: "Go away. I've got no friends. There's nobody to help a lone woman—nobody."

Jane, quite distracted at the sight of her sorrow, protested, "why, I'd do anything for you—anything."

"My dear, I need money—a great deal of money, I can't explain, but my great need is money. I want it for a few days only, but if I don't have it I'm ruined—ruined."

"How much?" asked Jane.

"At least $500."

"Oh, take my money, dear, take mine. Don't go on so. Eugene can wait a few days for the investment. Take mine."

"Bless you!" sobbed out Miss Parminter—"bless you! I will. It will be perfectly safe, and I promise faithfully to give it back. You've saved me from a lifetime of misery."

The two friends embraced, and the very next day the trusting dressmaker brought five crisp hundred-dollar bills—her whole fortune—from the savings bank and laid them in Miss Parminter's claw-like hand, which closed on them sharply. Then there were more embracing and tears, after which Jane went to her work, while the shrewd old maid snapped the money into a safe leather pocketbook, and muttered, "Little fool! I'll fix him."

The night after that, when Eugene called, Miss Parminter listened on the stairs. The visit was short, and as he went out he said; "Well, Jeannette, you've done an imprudent thing, but I suppose the old cat will give it back. I'll come again in a week."

"You suppose the old cat will give it back, do you?" repeated the lady so pleasantly designated as she closed the shop door just out of Mr. Eugene's ear-shot.

Every night poor Josiah hung about the sidewalk hoping for some news of encouragement. He never received any, beyond the curt reminder: "Now I'm doin' your courtin'. Don't you meddle."

A week later Eugene came again, and the guilty debtor, from that convenient stairway, heard Jane sob and say: "Oh, Eugene, I couldn't help it—indeed I couldn't; she's been such a kind friend, and she was in such trouble! Only wait; I'm sure she'll give it back soon."

"Old griffin!" exclaimed the young man; then added fiercely: "Look here, you get that money back at once, do you hear? Get it back!" and he went out, noisily slamming the door.

Jane rushed down to Miss Parminter and cried: "Oh, dear friend, do give me my money! Eugene is so angry because I shall lose the chance of making my fortune! Do give it back."

The old maid sadly shook her head, shed tears copiously, sobbed aloud, and declared she'd have hysterics. She couldn't return the money yet. She was in great trouble, and—oh! oh! oh!"

Jane drew a cup of tea for comfort. Neither could swallow any; so with more tears they ported, Jane to cry all night long, and the other to recover cheerfulness at once.

A few evenings after this, as Josiah, according to his wont, was humbly skulking about to catch some word of comfort, his heart leaped up to meet a smile on Miss Parminter's face and a gesture that brought him toward her. She carried him behind the counter, and after a curt explanation, a changing of money and the doing up of a parcel, Josiah remarked:

"I don't grudge the price, but it's just trash that won't be of no use to Jane."

"Now," cried the intriguing old person, indignantly, "you're a-givin' your opinion again. Who's a-managin' this courtin' affair?"

"You," Josiah answered, meekly, and went home docile and subdued.

Presently Jane slipped down stairs and asked, with an attempt at dignity that consorted ill with her tear-stained, quivering fate, "Please would you meet Mr. Brackett in my room about noon to morrow?"

"Certainly," responded Miss Parminter: "I ain't ashamed nor afraid to see Mr. Eugene Brackett at any time or any where."

The next day, promptly at noon she entered Jane's room, saying: "This bein' Walentine's Day, there's a pretty brick business. Some folks puts off buyin' till the last minute. Come, now, what do you want of me, Jane?"

The answer was a rap at the door, and in came Mr. Brackett. He paid no heed to Jane's greeting, but turned, with a business-like air, directly to Miss Parminter, and said: "I have to ask for the return of the five hundred dollars loaned to you by Miss Miller some two weeks ago."

"You have to ask it! And what have you to do with her money?"

"I take an interest in her and don't propose she shall be cheated by any appeal to her feelings."

"You don't say!" responded Miss Parminter, with her own dignified and scathing sarcasm—"you don't say! Well, Mr. Eugene Brackett, that money won't be returned. Miss Miller has nothing to show for it; there wasn't even a witness to the transaction. Now, then?"

Jane burst into tears and sobbed out, "How can you be so wicked? how can you?"

Mr. Brackett made his eyes very small and his action very large as he exclaimed, "I shall have you arrested old woman, for swindling." He moved to the door. She was there before him.

"Softly, Mr. Eugene. Ease up a bit. I've got a letter here that's of interest to you. I spent a whole day downtown a-findin' out how to get at the news that's into it. Come, now," and she opened a letter that she had drawn from her pocket—"come, now, look over with me, and we'll peruse it together friendly and pleasant. Come." Then she read aloud: "'There is no mine in Nevada known as the Paramount. The so-called prospects is a cheat, and so is the man called Eugene Brackett, who presuming on his father's honest name, has been in many fraudulent schemes for obtaining money.' It's signed by two leading men of Nevada. Now, young man, what's that glib tongue of yours got to say?"

Eugene stood silent and very white for a moment; then Jane rushed to him, threw her arms about his neck, and cried out: "I don't believe it, I don't believe it, my poor Eugene."

With some impatient muttering he threw her from him.

"Eugene, Eugene," she sobbed, "I say I don't believe it." He turned toward the door. "Are you going to leave me?"

"Oh, you little fool, yes."

"But you'll come back?"

"No!" thundered the dainty Eugene, and with an oath went quickly downstairs and out of the house.

Jane shrieked wildly. Miss Parminter caught her as she fell, fainting, and carried her to bed. There the judicious friend left her to "cry it out." By evening she paid her a short call, and remarked, cheerfuly:

"My dear, you see that man ain't worth your tears. He only wanted that hardearned money. He didn't care for you."

"I know it," answered Jane; "I know it."

"Well, as you're quite safe now, we'll talk about that money." She drew out and unsnapped a leather pocketbook, and counting out five bills, said, quietly: "Two, four, five hundred. There it is just as you gave it to me."

"What!"

"Oh, yes. I suspected that young thief, and I just got holt of your money, and kept it safe. There, there, don't cry; 'tain't nothin'. Go to sleep—so." "The soft-hearted spinster sobbed, and said to Jane: "You've got some sentiment and nonsense about yer, but I believe yer own good heart's a-comin' back again. Sich foolery as yours spiled my life, but it shan't spile yours, because I'll keep an eye to you."

That night, when the tempest of her grief passed, Jane received a pretty box, directed in Josiah's stiff handwriting. She opened it, wondering, and found a little wax Cupid holding out a loving scroll from a mass of fresh-cut flowers—the prettiest, costliest valentine she had ever seen. She comforted her hot, tear-stained cheeks upon the bed of roses, and couldn't help, after all, a gentle thought for the poor discarded plumber.

It is easy to see the end. Miss Parminter's daily advice to Josiah was, "Keep back them stockin's till you're married but buy her a rosebud now and then."

One happy day Jane announced, with a blush: "Josiah and I are going to be married; and in spite of all—all, you know, that happened last winter, I love him true."

"She does." Josiah proudly confirmed, "and I believe it."

Miss Parminter kissed them both, and cried out: "Josiah got that walentine in jist at the turnin'-p'int, jist when a little sentiment was a real comfort. A walentine done it! A walentine done it!"

Measure of Wealth.

In some parts of Africa a man's wealth is judged by the number of his wives. A man with sixty wives is looked upon as a sort of bonanza king. His wives probably go out washing at 50 cents a day, or make shirts at 40 cents a dozen. In this country a man's wealth is judged by the number of dogs he owns. The possessor of eight dogs is generally too poor to pay school tax, and his wife takes in washing.—Drake's Magazine,

Fight With a Lion.

Philadelphia Record.

In Lowande's barn, on Frankfort Street, are a number of wild animals that travel in summer with a circus. One day, having been kept on short rations, one of the lions broke his cage, and then with one bound was on the camel's back. His huge fangs soon tore a hole in the neck of the camel, and the lion was sucking at his blood. Keeper Emil Rebichon rushed into the building, but a savage roar from the lion caused him to lose no time in making safety behind the huge flanks of Express, the elephant, while Leo returned to his feast. When the keeper saw that he was safe from pursuit he unchained Empress, and the two started to the attack. Empress had witnessed too many scenes in her native jungle to be frightened now; besides, she had killed five keepers since she had been in captivity, and seemed anxious to add to her laurels. The lion rose as Empress approached, but was not quick enough to get out of the way, for with one blow from her trunk Empress hurled him against the stable wall. There he crouched in the corner for a moment, and then dashed at Empress with wild fury. He leaped upon her hind quarters, and the elephant trumpeted with rage and pain as she felt the lion's claws scratching her thick skin. But the lion was quickly routed from this position at the point of a pitchfork. Rebichon jumped behind Empress' big shoulders as the lion made a spring at him, and the elephant turned just in time to catch her antagonist in her trunk. She held him high in the air for a moment, and then hurled him clear across the stable.

The lion was evidently severely hurt, for he kept so still that the men had little trouble in lassoing him and leading him into another cage. The camel's carcass was skinned and the meat served to the animals.

A VENDETTA.

It was the sixth day of February, in the year of our Lord, 1883. In the Northern cities the Frost King still held undisputed sway, but New Orleans was bright with the blossoms and fragrance of spring.

It was a gay holiday, too, for it was Shrove Tuesday, and all business was suspended to watch the strange and entertaining scenes.

Crowds thronged the streets, and everywhere was bustle and excitement.

The day passed but night saw no cessation of festivities.

The sea of thronging faces looked weired and ghastly in the gaslight of the brilliant streets—that was all the difference, except that the crowd were mad with the excitement of the day.

Two Northern youths were enjoying the scene, borne hither and thither by the rushing crowds, until at last they found themselves near the Spanish market, where the scenes were singularly grotesque and strange.

"Come, Charlie, this is no place for us," whispered Jack Townsend, pulling at his companion's arm.

"See, these creatures are half mad with drink, and more than one murder will be done here before morning. Come away."

But, before Charles Newell could answer, or obey his friend's request, he was pushed violently against a young Spaniard, who turned on him fiercely.

"Maledicta!" he cried as he drew a gleaming stiletto and advanced threateningly.

"Come away!" cried Jack, but too late. Neither of them could ever tell clearly how it all happened.

There was a gleam of flashing steel, a sharp report, a startled yell of agony, and, as the Spaniard fell upon the pavement, dying, they fled from the spot, hotly pursued by a crowd of his frantic countrymen.

They reached their hotel in safety, but Charles Newell was a murderer, although the act was done in self-defense.

The next morning they left the scene of the tragedy.

"When the Spaniard fell, a slender, girlish figure darted to his side with a wild cry, and sank upon her knees.

"Speak to me, Rossi, my beloved," she panted, while her beautiful face was ghastly in its anguish and horror.

"Maledicta! Curse him!" the dying man uttered the words with difficulty. "Swear, Marie! Swear that you will avenge me! Swear the vendetta, my beloved!"

And, kneeling by her lover's side, the young Spanish girl took the terrible vow of vengeance, an obligation which the death of his murderer alone could release her from.

"Keep it, Marie. Keep it or my spirit shall haunt you, and my people shall cry Maledicta! whenever they meet you. May you starve—beg—die! if you are false. In sickness, or trouble may people curse you if you forget. May they bury you like a dog, when you die, and curse you as they spit upon your grave!" panted the dying lover.

"Don't Rossi, don't curse me! I will do it, only don't curse me," she sobbed, embracing him wildly.

"It is well. Kiss me my beloved. It is growing dark. Farewell!" and he was dead.

Marie Guino arose from his side, and saw the form of him whom she had loved so passionately born away to be prepared for the tomb, and the future seemed dark and drear.

She had money, she would visit the ice-bound North and seek her lover's murderer.

Should she find him, she must kill him, even though her own life paid the forfeit.

Days grew into months, and months into years, until five were numbered with the past.

Marie Guino was no longer a pretty, passionate maiden, but a calm, magnificent woman.

Association with others than her own fiery race, had nearly obliterated the terrible vendetta from her mind.

She no longer visited the halls of pleasure with such fierce, eager searching, but shuddered when she thought of the probable success of her mission of death.

She mingled with the gay society of a fashionable Northern city as an equal, reigning a queen in her own proud right.

Among the many who bowed at her shrine was one plainly favored one. A man not yet twenty-five years of age, but already well known in shrewd business circles, and reputed wealthy.

It was Christmas Eve, and grand parlors of Judge Linton's stone mansion were thronged.

In the conservatory, amid the fragrant bloom, Marie Guino and her lover sat alone.

"Then you love me, my dearest one? You acknowledge it? And you will be my cherished wife?" he cried, with an ardent lover's newfound rapture, seeking to clasp her to his heart.

"I cannot—I cannot until—I am free!" she panted with quivering lips, as she repulsed him. "You do not understand. Your people are not like ours. I love you, I love you, but I can never be your wife until my rash vow is fulfilled—and you—you would not wish to wed a murderess."

"What vow?" he asked in amazement, thinking that the fair being of his worship had suddenly taken leave of her senses.

"Listen. More than five years ago my lover was murdered in New Orleans. Nay, do not start from me, my dearest. I was a child then, but maidens of my race are betrothed very young. I loved him, but not as I love you, my soul's idol. It was one Shrove Tuesday, one evening when we were all at the Spanish market-place. Probably he had been drinking too much wine. He may have been the only one in fault. I do not know, but that will not release me from my vow, the terrible vow of vengeance which I took over Rossi's dying face—the Spaniard's vendetta. That is why I am not free to wed—why I cannot wed when my mission is ended.

"I have searched for the murderer in vain, but I shall find him. I shall know him at the proper time, and I must kill him before I am free. See, one drop of this, and he will die an unsuspected death. Easy, is it not?"

And she held up a tiny vial filled with a sweet, colorless fluid, then he recoiled and gazed in horror upon the face which bore her scrutiny unflinchingly, but which was rigid in its despair.

The proper time for retribution was come at last!

Every moment that face grew more familiar, until she could not doubt but that the man she now loved so madly was he whom she had sworn to kill.

"Not you!" she moaned, covering her face with her trembling hands. "I have sworn it—a fatal vendetta! I must do it, yet I cannot. Go! leave me now, but call at my home to-morrow. Ah, you have nothing to fear! I cannot harm you, my beloved."

With one swift, passionate kiss—which she had not power to repulse—he left her without one word of pleading.

He felt that words of justification were vain. Ah, what death is more bitter, more complete than the death of a strong man's hopes?—the vendetta was fulfilled! Early the next morning he called at her home, white, haggard, and despairing, but determined to seek death at her hands if she would not break her vow and become his wife.

But Marie Guino was gone! She had vanished when the world was asleep, and had left no clue to her hiding place.

No trace of her could be found, and the world—her world—still wonders over the mystery of the beautiful Spaniard's disappearance.

Only one can satisfy this curiosity, and he is silent. A white scented note, traced in a trembling hand, blotted by tears of bitter mental anguish, alone could solve the mystery, and that is not given to the public, but is worn close to a faithful, sorrowing, repentant heart.

"It cannot be, my heart's love," so it runs. "I can never be your wife. I cannot fulfill my mad vow. The security of convent life is therefore all that remains to me. There my people dare not curse me. Rossi will not come to haunt me. Fare thee well, and may you soon forget

"Your unhappy MARIE."

Yes, the vendetta was fulfilled. Once more they met, and soul answered soul in one swift glance, but the bars of the convent door were between them.

An Empress's Revenge.

The Veritzens were Russians of enormous wealth and power. Paul held a high office in court. One night, glittering with jewels and orders, the young prince, who was one of the handsomest men in Russia, danced in a quadrille opposite the Empress.

As she passed him in the dance she fancied that his eyes scanned her gross figure with covert amusement. After the quadrille she beckoned to him, and, with a smile, handed him her tiny ivory tablet, containg seven pages, one for each day in the week. On the first was written, "The imperial ball-room, St. Petersburg." On the last, "The mines, Siberia."

He read it, his face grew gray as that of a corpse, he bowed low, kissed her hand and withdrew, "talking," says the old chronicle, "his wife, the beautiful Princess of Novgorod, with him." He was heard to say, as he left the ball-room, "My minutes are numbered; let us not lose one."

Flight or resistance was impossible. The hold of Catherine on her victims was inexorable as death. Prince Veritzin was forced to remain passive in his palace, while each day the power, the wealth, and the happiness that life had given him were stripped from him.

First he was degraded from all offices at court; next his estates were confiscated by the crown; his friends were forbidden to hold any communication with him; his very name, one of the noblest in Russia, was taken from him, and he was given that of a serf. Then his wife and children were driven out of the palace to herd with beggars.

"On the last day," says the record, "Paul Veritzin, in rags and barefoot, chained to a convict, bade eternal farewell to his home, and departed to the dark, icy north. He was seen of men no more."

Illustrating the Text.

A Georgia negro, who preaches for a living, recently selected this text: "Be ye therefore wise as serpents and harmless as doves," and then began: "Well, bredderin, in order that we may all know what we are talkin' about, I will jes drap de word serpint and say snakes. My Poor Times.

"How did you sing to-night, my dear?"

"Oh, I had one of my poor times, mamma dear, sighed the singer, sinking into her chair at midnight, thoroughly disgusted with herself. The brave girl was weary, disheartened, and depressed in the extreme. I knew the family well; this widow of my old friend and three children, the oldest of whom had gone upon the platform to earn a scanty living for them all. Hence I sometimes called around, with my wife, and waited till the artist came home, to hear the report from her own point of view.

On this particular evening I felt solicitous for her to do well; it was a great concert, and our young friend had much at stake. Often I heard her; but this night I was forced to depend on the testimony of others, not being in the audience. I found, on inquiry, the next day, that the girl had "never done better," "never done as well," "was simply superb," and similar unvarying reports of critical friends present.

Now, I write this to all public performers—singers, actors, preachers, lecturers, etc. You are not the best judges when you do well, nor when you do ill.

"Your "feelings" have less to do with the performance than you suppose. You cannot estimate the effect of your public effort by consulting the barometer of your own mental sensations. You ought to know, by this time, unless you are very young at the business, that the very occasions when you were sure you "did splendidly," were the precise occasions when other people thought you were not feeling well, or came around to ask you what was troubling you; while, on the other hand, you have been surprised with the extravagant compliments on work which you did when you "felt like a fool and had one of your poor times." You ought at least to be above being wretched over what seems to you a failure, simply on the ground of an undefined sensation. If you went strongly on through your part, without a break, if you did the thing set for you to do without error, you may be sure that your feelings had nothing whatsoever to do with the judgment of the audience.

It often occurs that mental depression gives you the hint to exert yourself. You know you must exercise unusual care, put in more energy, and in every way fire up. That is all that the audience perceives. On the other hand, if you are feeling tip-top, you are tempted to be careless, to presume on your people, to veiw what you do through rose-colored glasses, and think that everybody else is in as high spirits as you are, and therefore will excuse slights. Nothing is more dangerous than to treat an audience too familiarly: they always take offense at it, sooner or later. Whereas a certain diffidence, at any rate the evidences of great care and a delicate shade of fear of them, promptly wins their welcome. Your own good times may not always betray you into undue familiarity; but certainly your bad times will make you deferential; that pleases them.

No public effort can always be put forth with the same even, calm, best preparation. Your child is taken sick just as you are going to sing. Alas, your heart is not in the song, but far away with the little sufferer. You get a telegram about the loss of property just as you are going on the stage; you meet a mean enemy at the stage door! you have an ill-fitting garment on, for which you paid a large price.

How little an audience realizes the preparatory scenes through which the lecturer has just come to confront them all in his dress-suit and smile. But a performer must not expect his audience to render him any charity? No. Well, then, he must not expect his own heart to render too much charity. That is, he must not expolt his good feelings to be always ready; no, nor half the time. He must just let his feelings take care of himself. When they are exultant and joyous, be thankful. When they are down, even to the half-sick or the absolute pain of "the blues," never mind, go right on mechanically. The audience will never know. In fact, you do not wish them to know your private emotions. The people pay their money, you give them their money's worth. Your own heart-aches are your own sacred possessions.

For one I protest against this notion that a lecturer, singer, or any public performer must "put his whole heart into it" each time. Why, man, woman, you will not live out half your days that way! No dry-goods dealer squeezes the very nectar of his soul into his business every day; there are times when the pursuit is an enthusiasm; but there are other times when he plods and attends to things in a humdrum spirit. I aver that no man can endure this turning of his very being inside out to please a crowd, night after night. Nor does God, the good one, ask it as the price of our bread. Be honest, be temperate, be scrupulous, do a good job each time, and keep your "inner soul" to yourself, except when you really would luxuriate in letting it out. Ten chances to one, even then, your audience will not thank you for it, because they will not know it. Such exuberant moments are, in fact, for your own private luxury; there are the times when you, and probably you alone, greatly enjoy your work.

There is no more fruitful source of the terrible habit of stimulating, so sadly prevalent among the class now addressed, than this mistaken surrender to a false theory. Why do you drink, Miss Actress? "Because I must feel well to meet the people." So replies every one except the minister; and, alas, he, too, has fallen a victim in more than one instance. Nonsense! It is a lie that you must feel well. Go, to your duty, as best you can, and let nature take care of herself. Let me tell you that the sooner you get your public performance into the mere habitude of a blacksmith or a lawyer, the better for you.

Let the excitement take care of itself. Heaven help you to eat, to sleep, to rest, to throw off your load at stated intervals, like your coat or mantle, and to assume it again with as natural an air as the ox does when he takes on his yoke. And may God bless the great army of people who meet the public to amuse and instruct, if they are worthy of His blessing. May you dignify your office by the thought that you willfully injure none, that you are trying to hold a little candle in this darksome world, and that you are trying to earn your honest bread. You are able to be, if you wish, as worthy a member of society as the railway king. There is a sense in which life is but a stage at best. There is another sense in which the humblest who makes life sweeter and purer is great.—Barkly Haker in New York Weekly.

Max O'Rell on Americans.

The Americans amuse Max O'Rell. The Frenchman finds that the average citizen of this country is working himself to death with a childlike simplicity and persistent cheerfulness which are very charming. The men of America, he says, live in a furnace of activity, while the women live in cotton wool. The latter have their own way in everything, they dress expensively on most occasions, and in their attire display a tendency to overelaboration.

The typical American does not exist as yet, according to the latest foreign critic. He has found that the inhabitants of the east and those of the west differ from each other, while both differ from the people of the south. "In all, however," he says, "I was struck with the mixture of power and energy most manly, with a gentleness almost womanly. The sternest of those pale, often careworn, faces light up with a smile that is sweetness itself."

The substance of the good-natured Frenchman's opinion of us that we are crude but kind-hearted, hard-working, simple-minded and generous. The lot of the American women is as near perfection as an earthly lot can be.

The men who dabble in politics are frowned upon by the upper classes. Americans are eccentric, daring, and fond of self-glorification. All in all, they are very nice people who have yet some things to learn from the French.

We Americans are glad that we have amused M. O'Rell and that he approves of us. He doesn't like the way in which we are governed, and on the whole we ourselves complain a good deal about our methods of government. Still, the Frenchman has only skimmed over the surface of things on this side of the water. Americans are more than amusing and clever. They are patriotic, firm, and virile to a degree. They are nation builders. Here the strongest creative forces in the civilized world are at work.—Chicago News.

Rider Haggard as a Boy.

Mr. Rider Haggard, the author of "She," "King Solomon's Mines," and other clever books, was educated a Ispwish grammar school. One of his old schoolfellows says that he was a tall, lanky youth, with a thick crop of unkempt hair, sharp features, prominent nose, and eyes that had rather a wild look about them.

Like many other boys he was supremely indifferent in the matter of dress, and he generally had the appearance of having grown out of his clothes. Boys and masters alike regarded him as good-natured, but rather stupid. As a scholar he did not shine.

Mr. Haggard now resides in Tregunter Square, South Kensington. In appearance he is tall and well-built, with a face that certainly is not remarkable for any particular look of cleverness.

He is a barrister, and has chambers in Elm Court, but does not practice. During the autumn Mr. Haggard resides at the family seat. He wears pince-nez, smokes a pipe a great deal, is fond of horses and dogs, and is believed to have netted £6,000 by his books up to the present. He first work, "Dawn," was a failure.—London "Answers."

In Church.

I feel a solemn sanctity,
Sweet rest of soul is mine,
My heart abides in pious peace,
My bonnet sets divine!
Grace, like a river, fills my soul,
In chastened joy I sit,
I feel religion's deepest power,
My sacque's a perfect fit.
A holy fervor penetrates
My soul's remotest nooks,
An earnest, chastened, fervid joy—
How neat that ribbon looks!
The good man tells of Christian peace,
The organ's anthem swells,
I bathe in streams of pure delight,
My dress cost more than Nell's!
O holy rest! O Sabbath calm!
O chastened peace serene!
I feel thy deep abiding spell—
How dowdy is Miss Green!
I feel a pure, religious glow,
O rapture undefined!
I know my bonnet looks so nice
To those who sit behind!

The Stamp Craze.

The craze for collecting postage stamps rages with more or less intensity all over the world. There are places where they are bought and sold in many of the larger cities. On a corner of the Champs Elysees of Paris, near the Circus building, you can see a crowd of men and boys assembled every Sunday afternoon, with little books in their hands which they are carefully studying and comparing. They are stamp collectors, and they meet to hold a stamp exchange. Old stamps are exchanged, bought and sold, and the rivalry to possess something very rare in that line will sometimes run it up to a high figure. There is more of the stamp craze in this country than many know. A spell ago a letter carrier in New York who had it bad, was arrested for removing stamps from foreign letters received at the New York post-office. On being searched his pockets were found to be full of them. It was a veritable mania with him.—Texas Siftings.

ASUNDER.

Once, when the sun, in slowly dying splendor
Sank, sending crimson smiles across the sea,
When, in the twilight, eyes looked true and tender—
"Tell me," you said, "how great your love for me."
Darker and darker grew the sea before us,
Turning, I saw a shadow at your side;
Mist filled the sky and hid the pale stars o'er us;
As those who speak in dreams my lips replied
"Some measure love by gold,
By endless time, by soundless sea;
But I—I love you well enough
To leave you, Love, if needs must be,"

Words, thoughtless words! but breathing doubt forbidden;
Fears, foolish fears! that love must lull to rest—
Not you or I knew then the meaning hidden,
Veiled in those words you deemed an idle jest
Now, Love with paths divided, hands asunder,
Now we have learnt the meaning, you and I—
Hid in the misty sky, the dark sea under,
And in those words I spoke, and knew not why,
"Some measure love by gold,
By endless time, by soundless sea,
But I—I love you well enough
To leave you, Love, if needs must be."

A Mysterions Visitor.

It was the practice of the good people of Bumpingtonshire to fill their houses for the annual hunt ball, and none were more assiduous in this respect than the Hardups, of Soakington Hall. The Hardups were a young married couple who had lived some few years in the neighborhood, and were both wealthy and hospitably disposed. Nothing in fact pleased them better than entertaining a houseful of cheery people. On the particular occasion with which we have now to deal, the Hardup's were anxious to eclipse the convivi ality o all other gatherings, and Mrs. Hardup had every reason to be satisfied with her success down to the day before the party was fixed to assemble. On the morning of that day, however, she received the following epistle from her cousin, Reggie Bunkham, one of the most highly prized of her expected guests:

> "DEAR CIS: I can't tell you how sorry I am to have to cry off at the last moment, but old Standish, who had come to us as under secretary, has done me the honor of selecting me to be his private secretary. He wants me to get into harness at once, so I can't possibly get away, as you will understand, but I wish you would invite my friend, Charlie Twizzleton, to take my place. You have heard me speak of him before, though you don't know him. He is such sport that I am sure you will be delighted with him. He is quite first rate on the banjo, and has a never ending reportaire of comic songs. Furthermore, is a capital conjuror, and mind you don't forget making him do the 'three dogs in a barrell.' You'd declare there really were three if you didn't know. You must not be surprised if he turns up as a tramp some time, or in some other outlandish character. A line to the Bachelor's Club will find him. I shall think of your festive party when I am grinding away at estimates and such like abominations. Love to Jack.

> "REGGIE BUNKHUM."

"I am sorry that Reggie is not coming," remarked Mrs. Hardup to her husband. "But it can't be helped. I suppose, however, that we may as well ask Mr. Twizzleton. He sounds as if he would be fun.

"Oh, by all means," responded the genial Jack Hardup. "Write and tell him we'll meet him by the 6.50 at Bumpington, if he can come, and ask him to send a wire in the morning."

Mrs. Hardup accordingly dispatched a note to Mr. Twizzleton. The next morning she received a telegram accepting her invitation, and the same afternoon, in due course, a carriage was dispatched to Bumpington Junction to meet the expected guest.

Mr. Twizzleton was, of course, freely canvassed at Mrs. Hardup's tea table that afternoon. Reggie Bunkum's account of his friends accomplishments naturally raised lively anticipations, and the appearance of the new comer was awaited with much curiosity. No one saw him arrive, for the train was late, and when the carriage returned from the station the Hardups and their guests were dressing for dinner; but after the company had assembled in the drawing room, Mr. Twizzleton was announced and made his appearance. Amazement fell upon all present. The new arrival was to all appearance about 60 years of age. His dress was such as was worn by elderly gentlemen of fashion in the days of Mr. Pickwick. A black satin stock enveloped his neck. He was gorgeous in a velvet waistcoat, copiously adorned with coral buttons. From his fob dangled a heavy bunch of old-fashioned seals and trinkets. The oddity of his appearance was further enhanced by a pair of green spectacles, the object of which the more acute observers present at once took to be to complete his disguise.

Only one explanation of this unexpected apparition seemed possible.

"I suppose," whispered Mrs. Hardup to her husband, when she had welcomed her guest and introduced him to the lady whom he was to take in to dinner, "that this is one of the disguises in which Reggie warned us that his friend might appear."

"Apparently so," returned Jack"; but it's rather queer form to lead off with a practical joke of this description. What on earth are we to say to him?"

Fortunately dinner was at once announced, and put an end to the momentary awkwardness which Mr. Twizzleton's little joke had caused. The majority of the company were, like their host, uncertain what line to take with this practical joker, and, as a consequence, he was left during the progress of the meal mainly to the society of Mrs. Carnegie, whom he had brought in to dinner. This lady was the well preserved and vivacious widow of an Indian judge, and flattered herself that she was fully a match for the eccentric individual by her side. They had not conversed very long, however, before Mr. Twizzleton fairly puzzled her.

"I hope, Mr. Twizzleton," she remarked, soon after they were settled in their places, "that your sight is not so bad as to prevent your dancing this evening?"

"Dancing, my dear madam!" replied Mr. Twizzleton; "I fear my infirmity of sight is not the only obstacle to that. It is thirty years since I considered myself a dancing man, and to be asked to dance was the last thing I expected when I came here."

"Indeed!" returned the widow, with an arch glance. "Did you expect to be left in charge of the hall while the rest of us disport ourselves at the Bumpington ball?"

"Ah, madam, I see that you are joking," replied the imperturbable Twizzleton. "My engagement with our charming hostess, whom I am agreeably surprised to see looking so well, is the only occupation I can look forward to to-night."

"Well," said Mrs. Carnegie, with a little toss of the hand, "of course you will have to dance with Cicely, but it is a little cool to inform me that you intend to favor nobody else—even though she be our hostess."

Mr. Twizzleton assumed an air of astonishment which would have done credit to any actor on the boards.

"I dance with her!" he exclaimed. "Surely, madam, I misunderstood you? I cannot believe that a lady would dream of dancing under such circumstances."

"And why not, pray?" inquired the widow.

"Because it would be the height of imprudence—I had almost said madness. So far from encouraging her, I should feel bound to forbid anything of the kind."

Mrs. Carnegie looking at Mr. Twizzleton's, unmoved features, and felt thoroughly mystified. She tried other lines of conversations but had no better success in persuading him to drop his assumed character.

Before dinner she was more than half convinced that he was not acting at all, and that the real author of the farce was Mr. Reggie Bunkum, who had amused himself by palming off this old fossil upon his cousin for a drawing-room comique.

When the ladies had retired, the male portion of the company tried their hands at drawing out Mr. Twizzleton; but as they succeeded no better than Mrs. Carnegie in getting behind his disguise, the opinion was very soon formed that the joke was a dismal failure, and that Mr. Twizzleton was making an egregious fool of himself. The last hope of getting any fun out of the thing expired on their return to the drawing-room. On being sounded respecting his banjo. Reggie Bunkum's boasted chum vehemently repudiated any knowledge of the instrument while a request from Mrs. Hardup for the "three dogs in a barrel" produced a look of hopeless bewilderment upon his features which was almost pathetic in its insanity.

In the meantime, however, the striking realization of Mr. Twizzleton's performance had made an impression on Jack Hardup somewhat similar to that on Mrs. Carnegie, only Jack's suspicions took a somewhat different direction from the widow's. When the gentlemen moved off to the drawing-room, the master of the house called Thompson, his trusty butler, on one side, and interrogated him closely as to Mr. Twizzleton's appearance on his arrival. The butler no sooner gathered that his master was perplexed about his new guest then he proceeded to unburden his own mind.

"Beg pardon, sir," he said "but do I understand as you think there is some mistake about Mr. Twizzleton?"

"He is not at all the sort of a gentleman I expected to see, Thompson. But why do you ask?"

"Because I see some things, sir, when I was unpacking the portmanteau that I don't like the look of at all."

"What sort of things?" inquired Hardup.

"Well, sir, p'raps as the gentleman are all in the drawing-room now, you wouldn't mind stepping upstairs and seeing for yourself. I can lay my hand on'em in a moment."

Jack reflected an instant, hesitating between the obligations of hospitality and anxiety to get to the bottom of the Twizzleton mystery. The latter motive prevailed, and he accordingly hurried up to Mr. Twizzleton's apartment, followed by the butler.

Thompson at once produced two black leather cases. Opening the first, Hardup found it to contain several mysterious looking instruments of the nature and purpose of which he was ignorant. In the second, however, he was startled to find a pair of desperate looking knives, with long blades highly polished, and as keen as razors. The very sight of them made Jack's blood run cold.

"Well Thompson," he said, more puzzled than ever, "what do you make of these?"

"'Taint for me to say, sir," replied the butler; "but I hope they don't mean murder, that's all."

"Murder! What do you mean?"

"Well, sir, if as you say you have your doubts about the gentleman being Mr. Twizzleton, all I can say is that some of these burglars and gentleman sharpers have precious artful ways of gettin' into folks' houses, and if those tools" (Thompson pointed to the first case) "ain't part of a burglar's stock-in-trade, I'm——"

"Nonsense Thompson!" interrupted his master. "You've got burglary on the brain. Put the things back and say nothing more about it."

With that Hardup made his way back to the drawing-room, feeling rather guilty. He found that Mr. Twizzleton was not in the room. Nor was Mrs. Hardup. Jack was told that Twizzleton had earnestly begged for five minutes' conversation with his hostess, and that they had gone together into the library only a moment ago. The company were busily discussing the mysterious stranger.

"I don't believe his face is made up at all," said one lady. "I could see wrinkles distinctly, and I'm sure he never hired such a bald head as that."

"My impression is that the whole thing is a joke of Reggie Bunkum's," observed Mrs. Carnegie, adhering to her previous theory.

"I believe," said Mr. Fred Jarvis, "that it is Reggie's friend, and that he has gone off his head. I have heard of cases where fellows have played the fool in this way until they have come to believe that they are somebody else."

At that moment a piercing shriek resounded through the house and library, causing the guests to look at one another with horrified glances. Followed by Mr. Jarvis and the rest of the gentleman, Hardup hurried away in the direction of the disturbance. Opening the library door, they found Mrs. Hardup, to all appearance, half fainting with terror, and clinging to the bell pull, while Mr. Twizzleton stood between her and the door, evidently scarcely less agitated.

"Oh, hold him! hold him?" shrieked the lady. "He's mad! He is going to murder me!"

There was certainly some reason for alarm, for on the table lay a case of weapons scarcely less formidable than those Hardup had seen upstairs.

"What is the meaning of this, sir?" cried Jack, while two or three gentlemen caustiously surrounded Mr. Twizzleton.

"My dear sir," replied the stranger, mopping the perspiration from his brow with a red silk handkerchief, "I'm as much at loss to understand matters as yourself. I desired to see your good lady in order to remonstrate on her imprudence in not taking more care of herself. On my producing my instruments for the purpose of making an examination, and asking to see her leg, she at once fell into the state of agitation which you perceive."

"Either you must be out of your mind, Mr. Twizzleton," exclaimed Hardup, angrily, "or this is the most impertinent fooling I ever—"

The sentencence was cut short by the entrance of the butler. Jack was about to say that he could not be interrupted at this moment, but, on Thompson mysteriously whispering something in his ear, he made a hasty apology to the company, and left the room. In half a minute he returned accompanied by a gentleman of 24 or 25, in traveling clothes:

"Now, sir," said Hardup, addressing Mr. Twizzleton, "this gentleman" (indicating the new comer) "claims to be Mr. Charles Twizzleton, whom we expected by the 6.50 train at Bumpington this evening. It seems that, by some mistake, he has been taken elsewhere. Perhaps you can explain how it is that you have got there in his place and under his name?"

"If you will excuse me for a minute," interposed the new Twizzleton, "I think I can throw some light on the situation." Thereupon he informed the company how, on his arrival at Bumpington, he had been accosted by a man servant, who inquired whether he was "Mr. Twizzleton for Soakington," and on his replying in the affirmative, how he had been at once conveyed to a house four or five miles off, which he has since learned was the Manor House, Soakington.

"What an extraordinary mistake!" exclaimed Hardup. "How did you discover it?"

"As soon as I arrived a starchy-looking spinster met me, and pretty nearly threw me on my beam-ends by asking, in a solemn tone, whether I would look at mamma's leg at once or wait until Mr. Squills came. You see I concluded there must be a mistake somewhere. Squills arrived in half an hour. It turned out that he was the local doctor. The mamma, whose name I found was Seely, and not Hardup, had something wrong, it seems, with her left leg; and Squills, considering that amputation was necessary, had called on my eminent namesake, Dr. Theophilus Twizzleton, of Harley street, who was oddly enough expected by the same train as myself. Unless I am mistaken, Mr. Hardup, you have got him here."

On hearing this elder Mr. Twizzleton at once produced his card and handed it to Hardup, apoligizing at the same time for his intrusion:

"I am delighted, my dear madam," he said, turning to Mrs. Hardup, "that you have no occasion for my services. With your permission I will now go to poor Mrs. Seely, and leave my namesake to perform with the banjo and the three dogs in the barrel."

But he did not go. The hospitable Hardups insisted on making amends for his discomfiture by keeping him for the night and taking him to the Bumpington ball. There Mrs. Carnegie persuaded him to renew his dancing days, and devoted herself to consoling him with so much success that it is very likely there will soon be a Mrs. Twizzleton in Harley street

Miscalculation.

"John," said a wife who was supposed to be on her deathbed, "in case of my death I think a man of your temperament and domestic nature aside from the good of the children, ought to marry again." "Do you think so, my dear?" "I certainly do, after a reasonable length of time." "Well, now, do you know, my dear, that relieves my mind of a great burden. The little Widow Jenkins has acted rather demure toward me ever since you were taken sick. She is not the woman that you are, of course, a strongminded, intelligent woman of character, but she is plump and pretty, and I am sure she would make me a very desirable wife." The next day Mrs. John was able to sit up, the following day she went down stairs, and on the third day was planning for a new dress.—New York Sun.

A Toper's Paradise.

The town of Arroyo Grande is on the boundary line between Arizona and Mexico, a fact which enables the topers to work an old game. They step into a saloon on the Arizona side and ask for a drink, laying down an American dollar. The chances are that the bartender will give him a Mexican dollar in change, it being worth only 90 cents. Then they strike a saloon on the Mexican side and tender the Mexican dollar for a drink, getting an American dollar for change, which in this case is worth only 90 cents. The truthful editor of the Arizona Howler says that the practice has broken up all the saloons in the town.

A VENDETTA.

It was the sixth day of February, in the year of our Lord, 1883. In the Northern cities the Frost King still held undisputed sway, but New Orleans was bright with the blossoms and fragrance of spring.

It was a gay holiday, too, for it was Shrove Tuesday, and all business was suspended to watch the strange and entertaining scenes.

Crowds thronged the streets, and everywhere was bustle and excitement.

The day passed but night saw no cessation of festivities.

The sea of thronging faces looked weired and ghastly in the gaslight of the brilliant streets—that was all the difference, except that the crowd were mad with the excitement of the day.

Two Northern youths were enjoying the scene, borne hither and thither by the rushing crowds, until at last they found themselves near the Spanish market, where the scenes were singularly grotesque and strange.

"Come, Charlie, this is no place for us," whispered Jack Townsend, pulling at his companion's arm.

"See, these creatures are half mad with drink, and more than one murder will be done here before morning. Come away."

But, before Charles Newell could answer, or obey his friend's request, he was pushed violently against a young Spaniard, who turned on him fiercely.

"Maledicta!" he cried as he drew a gleaming stiletto and advanced threateningly.

"Come away!" cried Jack, but too late. Neither of them could ever tell clearly how it all happened.

There was a gleam of flashing steel, a sharp report, a startled yell of agony, and, as the Spaniard fell upon the pavement, dying, they fled from the spot, hotly pursued by a crowd of his frantic countrymen.

They reached their hotel in safety, but Charles Newell was a murderer, although the act was done in self-defense.

The next morning they left the scene of the tragedy.

"When the Spaniard fell, a slender, girlish figure darted to his side with a wild cry, and sank upon her knees.

"Speak to me, Rossi, my beloved," she panted, while her beautiful face was ghastly in its anguish and horror.

"Maledicta! Curse him!" the dying man uttered the words with difficulty. "Swear, Marie! Swear that you will avenge me! Swear the vendetta, my beloved!"

And, kneeling by her lover's side, the young Spanish girl took the terrible vow of vengeance, an obligation which the death of his murderer alone could release her from.

"Keep it, Marie. Keep it or my spirit shall haunt you, and my people shall cry Maledicta! whenever they meet you. May you starve—beg—die! if you are false. In sickness, or trouble may people curse you if you forget. May they bury you like a dog, when you die, and curse you as they spit upon your grave!" panted the dying lover.

"Don't Rossi, don't curse me! I will do it, only don't curse me," she sobbed, embracing him wildly.

"It is well. Kiss me my beloved. It is growing dark. Farewell!" and he was dead.

Marie Guino arose from his side, and saw the form of him whom she had loved so passionately born away to be prepared for the tomb, and the future seemed dark and drear.

She had money, she would visit the ice-bound North and seek her lover's murderer.

Should she find him, she must kill him, even though her own life paid the forfeit.

Days grew into months, and months into years, until five were numbered with the past.

Marie Guino was no longer a pretty, passionate maiden, but a calm, magnificent woman.

Association with others than her own fiery race, had nearly obliterated the terrible vendetta from her mind.

She no longer visited the halls of pleasure with such fierce, eager searching, but shuddered when she thought of the probable success of her mission of death.

She mingled with the gay society of a fashionable Northern city as an equal, reigning a queen in her own proud right.

Among the many who bowed at her shrine was one plainly favored one. A man not yet twenty-five years of age, but already well known in shrewd business circles, and reputed wealthy.

It was Christmas Eve, and grand parlors of Judge Linton's stone mansion were thronged.

In the conservatory, amid the fragrant bloom, Marie Guino and her lover sat alone.

"Then you love me, my dearest one? You acknowledge it? And you will be my cherished wife?" he cried, with an ardent lover's newfound rapture, seeking to clasp her to his heart.

"I cannot—I cannot until—I am free!" she panted with quivering lips, as she repulsed him. "You do not understand. Your people are not like ours. I love you, I love you, but I can never be your wife until my rash vow is fulfilled—and you—you would not wish to wed a murderess."

"What vow?" he asked in amazement, thinking that the fair being of his worship had suddenly taken leave of her senses.

"Listen. More than five years ago my lover was murdered in New Orleans. Nay, do not start from me, my dearest. I was a child then, but maidens of my race are betrothed very young. I loved him, but not as I love you, my soul's idol. It was one Shrove Tuesday, one evening when we were all at the Spanish market-place. Probably he had been drinking too much wine. He may have been the only one in fault. I do not know, but that will not release me from my vow, the terrible vow of vengeance which I took over Rossi's dying face—the Spaniard's vendetta. That is why I am not free to wed—why I cannot wed when my mission is ended.

"I have searched for the murderer in vain, but I shall find him. I shall know him at the proper time, and I must kill him before I am free. See, one drop of this, and he will die an unsuspected death. Easy, is it not?"

And she held up a tiny vial filled with a sweet, colorless fluid, then he recoiled and gazed in horror upon the face which bore her scrutiny unflinchingly, but which was rigid in its despair.

The proper time for retribution was come at last!

Every moment that face grew more familiar, until she could not doubt but that the man she now loved so madly was he whom she had sworn to kill.

"Not you!" she moaned, covering her face with her trembling hands. "I have sworn it—a fatal vendetta! I must do it, yet I cannot. Go! leave me now, but call at my home to-morrow. Ah, you have nothing to fear! I cannot harm you, my beloved."

With one swift, passionate kiss—which she had not power to repulse—he left her without one word of pleading.

He felt that words of justification were vain. Ah, what death is more bitter, more complete than the death of a strong man's hopes?—the vendetta was fulfilled! Early the next morning he called at her home, white, haggard, and despairing, but determined to seek death at her hands if she would not break her vow and become his wife.

But Marie Guino was gone! She had vanished when the world was asleep, and had left no clue to her hiding place.

No trace of her could be found, and the world—her world—still wonders over the mystery of the beautiful Spaniard's disappearance.

Only one can satisfy this curiosity, and he is silent. A white scented note, traced in a trembling hand, blotted by tears of bitter mental anguish, alone could solve the mystery, and that is not given to the public, but is worn close to a faithful, sorrowing, repentant heart.

"It cannot be, my heart's love," so it runs. I can never be your wife. I cannot fulfill my mad vow. The security of convent life is therefore all that remains to me. There my people dare not curse me. Rossi will not come to haunt me. Fare thee well, and may you soon forget

"Your unhappy MARIE."

Yes, the vendetta was fulfilled. Once more they met, and soul answered soul in one swift glance, but the bars of the convent door were between them.

An Empress's Revenge.

The Veritzens were Russians of enormous wealth and power. Paul held a high office in court. One night, glittering with jewels and orders, the young prince, who was one of the handsomest men in Russia, danced in a quadrille opposite the Empress.

As she passed him in the dance she fancied that his eyes scanned her gross figure with covert amusement. After the quadrille she beckoned to him, and, with a smile, handed him her tiny ivory tablet, containg seven pages, one for each day in the week. On the first was written, "The imperial ball-room, St. Petersburg." On the last, "The mines, Siberia."

He read it, his face grew gray as that of a corpse, he bowed low, kissed her hand and withdrew, "talking," says the old chronicle, "his wife, the beautiful Princess of Novgorod, with him." He was heard to say, as he left the ball-room, "My minutes are numbered; let us not lose one."

Flight or resistance was impossible. The hold of Catherine on her victims was inexorable as death. Prince Veritzin was forced to remain passive in his palace, while each day the power, the wealth, and the happiness that life had given him were stripped from him.

First he was degraded from all offices at court; next his estates were confiscated by the crown; his friends were forbidden to hold any communication with him; his very name, one of the noblest in Russia, was taken from him, and he was given that of a serf. Then his wife and children were driven out of the palace to herd with beggars.

"On the last day," says the record, "Paul Veritzin, in rags and barefoot, chained to a convict, bade eternal farewell to his home, and departed to the dark, icy north. He was seen of men no more."

Illustrating the Text.

A Georgia negro, who preaches for a living, recently selected this text: "Be ye therefore wise as serpents and harmless as doves," and then began: "Well, bredderin, in order that we may all know what we are talkin' about, I will jes drap de word serpint and say snakes. You has all seen a snake when he didn't want to hear nothing. He jes puts one ear right down on de ground and stick he tail in de odder."

My Poor Times.

"How did you sing to-night, my dear?"

"Oh, I had one of my poor times, mamma dear, sighed the singer, sinking into her chair at midnight, thoroughly disgusted with herself. The brave girl was weary, disheartened, and depressed in the extreme. I knew the family well; this widow of my old friend and three children, the oldest of whom had gone upon the platform to earn a scanty living for them all. Hence I sometimes called around, with my wife, and waited till the artist came home, to hear the report from her own point of view.

On this particular evening I felt solicitous for her to do well; it was a great concert, and our young friend had much at stake. Often I heard her; but this night I was forced to depend on the testimony of others, not being in the audience. I found, on inquiry, the next day, that the girl had "never done better," "never done as well," "was simply superb," and similar unvarying reports of critical friends present.

Now, I write this to all public performers—singers, actors, preachers, lecturers, etc. You are not the best judges when you do well, nor when you do ill.

"Your "feelings" have less to do with the performance than you suppose. You cannot estimate the effect of your public effort by consulting the barometer of your own mental sensations. You ought to know, by this time, unless you are very young at the business, that the very occasions when you were sure you "did splendidly," were the precise occasions when other people thought you were not feeling well, or came around to ask you what was troubling you; while, on the other hand, you have been surprised with the extravagant compliments on work which you did when you "felt like a fool and had one of your poor times." You ought at least to be above being wretched over what seems to you a failure, simply on the ground of an undefined sensation. If you went strongly on through your part, without a break, if you did the thing set for you to do without error, you may be sure that your feelings had nothing whatsoever to do with the judgment of the audience.

It often occurs that mental depression gives you the hint to exert yourself. You know you must exercise unusual care, put in more energy, and in every way fire up. That is all that the audience perceives. On the other hand, if you are feeling tip-top, you are tempted to be careless, to presume on your people, to veiw what you do through rose-colored glasses, and think that everybody else is in as high spirits as you are, and therefore will excuse slights. Nothing is more dangerous than to treat an audience too familiarly: they always take offense at it, sooner or later. Whereas a certain diffidence, at any rate the evidences of great care and a delicate shade of fear of them, promptly wins their welcome. Your own good times may not always betray you into undue familiarity; but certainly your bad times will make you deferential; that pleases them.

No public effort can always be put forth with the same even, calm, best preparation. Your child is taken sick just as you are going to sing. Alas, your heart is not in the song, but far away with the little sufferer. You get a telegram about the loss of property just as you are going on the stage; you meet a mean enemy at the stage door; you have an ill-fitting garment on, for which you paid a large price.

How little an audience realizes the preparatory scenes through which the lecturer has just come to confront them all in his dress-suit and smile. But a performer must not expect his audience to render him any charity? No. Well, then, he must not expect his own heart to render too much charity. That is, he must not expelt his good feelings to be always ready; no, nor half the time. He must just let his feelings take care of himself. When they are exultant and joyous, be thankful. When they are down, even to the half-sick or the absolute pain of "the blues," never mind, go right on mechanically. The audience will never know. In fact, you do not wish them to know your private emotions. The people pay their money, you give them their money's worth. Your own heart-aches are your own sacred possessions.

For one I protest against this notion that a lecturer, singer, or any public performer must "put his whole heart into it" each time. Why, man, woman, you will not live out half your days that way! No dry-goods dealer squeezes the very nectar of his soul into his business every day; there are times when the pursuit is an enthusiasm; but there are other times when he plods and attends to things in a humdrum spirit. I aver that no man can endure this turning of his very being inside out to please a crowd, night after night. Nor does God, the good one, ask it as the price of our bread. Be honest, be temperate, be scrupulous, do a good job each time, and keep your "inner soul" to yourself, except when you really would luxuriate in letting it out. Ten chances to one, even then, your audience will not thank you for it, because they will not know it. Such exuberant moments are, in fact, for your own private luxury; there are the times when you, and probably you alone, greatly enjoy your work.

There is no more fruitful source of the terrible habit of stimulating, so sadly prevalent among the class now addressed, than this mistaken surrender to a false theory. Why do you drink, Miss Actress? "Because I must feel well to meet the people." So replies every one except the minister; and, alas, he, too, has fallen a victim in more than one instance. Nonsense! It is a lie that you must feel well. Go, do your duty, as best you can, and let nature take care of herself. Let me tell you that the sooner you get your public performance into the mere habitude of a blacksmith or a lawyer, the better for you.

Let the excitement take care of itself. Heaven help you to eat, to sleep, to rest, to throw off your load at stated intervals, like your coat or mantle, and to assume it again with as natural an air as the ox does when he takes on his yoke. And may God bless the great army of people who meet the public to amuse and instruct, if they are worthy of His blessing. May you dignify your office by the thought that you willfully injure none, that you are trying to hold a little candle in this darksome world, and that you are trying to earn your honest bread. You are able to be, if you wish, as worthy a member of society as the railway king. There is a sense in which life is but a stage at best. There is another sense in which the humblest who makes life sweeter and purer is great.—Barkly Haker in New York Weekly.

Max O'Rell on Americans.

The Americans amuse Max O'Rell. The Frenchman finds that the average citizen of this country is working himself to death with a childlike simplicity and persistent cheerfulness which are very charming. The men of America, he says, live in a furnace of activity, while the women live in cotton wool. The latter have their own way in everything, they dress expensively on most occasions, and in their attire display a tendency to overelaboration.

The typical American does not exist as yet, according to the latest foreign critic. He has found that the inhabitants of the east and those of the west differ from each other, while both differ from the people of the south. "In all, however," he says, "I was struck with the mixture of power and energy most manly, with a gentleness almost womanly. The sternest of those pale, often careworn, faces light up with a smile that is sweetness itself."

The substance of the good-natured Frenchman's opinion of us that we are crude but kind-hearted, hard-working, simple-minded and generous. The lot of the American women is as near perfection as an earthly lot can be.

The men who dabble in politics are frowned upon by the upper classes. Americans are eccentric, daring, and fond of self-glorification. All in all, they are very nice people who have yet some things to learn from the French.

We Americans are glad that we have amused M. O'Rell and that he approves of us. He doesn't like the way in which we are governed, and on the whole we ourselves complain a good deal about our methods of government. Still, the Frenchman has only skimmed over the surface of things on this side of the water. Americans are more than amusing and clever. They are patriotic, firm, and virile to a degree. They are nation builders. Here the strongest creative forces in the civilized world are at work.—Chicago News.

Rider Haggard as a Boy.

Mr. Rider Haggard, the author of "She," "King Solomon's Mines," and other clever books, was educated a Ipswish grammar school. One of his old schoolfellows says that he was a tall, lanky youth, with a thick crop of unkempt hair, sharp features, prominent nose, and eyes that had rather a wild look about them.

Like many other boys he was supremely indifferent in the matter of dress, and he generally had the appearance of having grown out of his clothes. Boys and masters alike regarded him as good-natured, but rather stupid. As a scholar he did not shine.

Mr. Haggard now resides in Tregunter Square, South Kensington. In appearance he is tall and well-built, with a face that certainly is not remarkable for any particular look of cleverness.

He is a barrister, and has chambers in Elm Court, but does not practice. During the autumn Mr. Haggard resides at the family seat. He wears pince-nez, smokes a pipe a great deal, is fond of horses and dogs, and is believed to have netted £6,000 by his books up to the present. He first work, "Dawn," was a failure.—London "Answers."

In Church.

I feel a solemn sanctity,
Sweet rest of soul is mine,
My heart abides in pious peace,
My bonnet sets divine!
Grace, like a river, fills my soul,
In chastened joy I sit,
I feel religion's deepest power,
My sacque's a perfect fit.
A holy fervor penetrates
My soul's remotest nooks,
An earnest, chastened, fervid joy—
How neat that ribbon looks!
The good man tells of Christian peace,
The organ's anthem swells,
I bathe in streams of pure delight,
My dress cost more than Nell's!
O holy rest! O Sabbath calm!
O chastened peace serene!
I feel thy deep abiding spell—
How dowdy is Miss Green!
I feel a pure, religious glow,
O rapture undefined!
I know my bonnet looks so nice
To those who sit behind!

The Stamp Craze.

The craze for collecting postage stamps rages with more or less intensity all over the world. There are places where they are bought and sold in many of the larger cities. On a corner of the Champs Elysees of Paris, near the Circus building, you can see a crowd of men and boys assembled every Sunday afternoon, with little books in their hands which they are carefully studying and comparing. They are stamp collectors, and they meet to hold a stamp exchange. Old stamps are exchanged, bought and sold, and the rivalry to possess something very rare in that line will sometimes run it up to a high figure. There is more of the stamp craze in this country than many know. A spell ago a letter carrier in New York who had it bad, was arrested for removing stamps from foreign letters received at the New York post-office. On being searched his pockets were found to be full of them. It was a veritable mania with him.—Texas Siftings.

ASUNDER.

Once, when the sun, in slowly dying splendor
Sank, sending crimson smiles across the sea,
When, in the twilight, eyes looked true and tender—
"Tell me," you said, "how great your love for me."
Darker and darker grew the sea before us,
Turning, I saw a shadow at your side;
Mist filled the sky and hid the pale stars o'er us;
As those who speak in dreams my lips replied
"Some measure love by gold,
By endless time, by soundless sea;
But I—I love you well enough
To leave you, Love, if needs must be."

Words, thoughtless words! but breathing doubt forbidden;
Fears, foolish fears! that love must lull to rest—
Not you or I knew then the meaning hidden,
Veiled in those words you deemed an idle jest
Now, Love with paths divided, hands asunder,
Now we have learnt the meaning, you and I—
Hid in the misty sky, the dark sea under,
And in those words I spoke, and knew not why,
"Some measure love by gold,
By endless time, by soundless sea,
But I—I love you well enough
To leave you, Love, if needs must be."

A Mysterions Visitor.

It was the practice of the good people of Bumpingtonshire to fill their houses for the annual hunt ball, and none were more assiduous in this respect than the Hardups, of Soakington Hall. The Hardups were a young married couple who had lived some few years in the neighborhood, and were both wealthy and hospitably disposed. Nothing in fact pleased them better than entertaining a houseful of cheery people. On the particular occasion with which we have now to deal, the Hardup's were anxious to eclipse the convivi ality o all other gatherings, and Mrs. Hardup had every reason to be satisfied with her success down to the day before the party was fixed to assemble. On the morning of that day, however, she received the following epistle from her cousin, Reggie Bunkham, one of the most highly prized of her expected guests:

"DEAR CIS: I can't tell you how sorry I am to have to cry off at the last moment, but old Standish, who had come to us as under secretary, has done me the honor of selecting me to be his private secretary. He wants me to get into harness at once, so I can't possibly get away, as you will understand, but I wish you would invite my friend, Charlie Twizzleton, to take my place. You have heard me speak of him before, though you don't know him. He is such sport that I am sure you will be delighted with him. He is quite first rate on the banjo, and has a never ending reportaire of comic songs. Furthermore, is a capital conjuror, and mind you don't forget making him do the 'three dogs in a barrell.' You'd declare there really were three if you didn't know. You must not be surprised if he turns up as a tramp some time, or in some other outlandish character. A line to the Bachelor's Club will find him. I shall think of your festive party when I am grinding away at estimates and such like abominations. Love to Jack.

"Your affectionate cousin.

"REGGIE BUNKHUM."

"I am sorry that Reggie is not coming," remarked Mrs. Hardup to her husband. "But it can't be helped. I suppose, however, that we may as well ask Mr. Twizzleton. He sounds as if he would be fun.

"Oh, by all means," responded the genial Jack Hardup. "Write and tell him we'll meet him by the 6.50 at Bumpington, if he can come, and ask him to send a wire in the morning."

Mrs. Hardup accordingly dispatched a note to Mr. Twizzleton. The next morning she received a telegram accepting her invitation, and the same afternoon, in due course, a carriage was dispatched to Bumpington Junction to meet the expected guest.

Mr. Twizzleton was, of course, freely canvassed at Mrs. Hardup's tea table that afternoon. Reggie Bunkum's account of his friends accomplishments naturally raised lively anticipations, and the appearance of the new comer was awaited with much curiosity. No one saw him arrive, for the train was late, and when the carrage returned from the station the Hardups and their guests were dressing for dinner; but after the company had assembled in the drawing room, Mr. Twizzleton was announced and made his appearance. Amazement fell upon all present. The new arrival was to all appearance about 60 years of age. His dress was such as was worn by elderly gentlemen of fashion in the days of Mr. Pickwick. A black satin stock enveloped his neck. He was gorgeous in a velvet waistcoat, copiously adorned with coral buttons. From his fob dangled a heavy bunch of old-fashioned seals and trinkets. The oddity of his appearance was further enhanced by a pair of green spectacles, the object of which the more acute observers present at once took to be to complete his disguise.

Only one explanation of this unexpected apparition seemed possible.

"I suppose," whispered Mrs. Hardup to her husband, when she had welcomed her guest and introduced him to the lady whom he was to take in to dinner, "that this is one of the disguises in which Reggie warned us that his friend might appear."

"Apparently so," returned Jack"; but it's rather queer form to lead off with a practical joke of this description. What on earth are we to say to him?"

Fortunately dinner was at once announced, and put an end to the momentary awkwardness which Mr. Twizzleton's little joke had caused. The majority of the company were, like their host, uncertain what line to take with this practical joker, and, as a consequence, he was left during the progress of the meal mainly to the society of Mrs. Carnegie, whom he had brought in to dinner. This lady was the well preserved and vivacious widow of an Indian judge, and flattered herself that she was fully a match for the eccentric individual by her side. They had not conversed very long, however, before Mr. Twizzleton fairly puzzled her.

"I hope, Mr. Twizzleton," she remarked, soon after they were settled in their places, "that your sight is not so bad as to prevent your dancing this evening?"

"Dancing, my dear madam!" replied Mr. Twizzleton; "I fear my infirmity of sight is not the only obstacle to that. It is thirty years since I considered myself a dancing man, and to be asked to dance was the last thing I expected when I came here."

"Indeed!" returned the widow, with an arch glance. "Did you expect to be left in charge of the hall while the rest of us disport ourselves at the Bumpington ball?"

"Ah, madam, I see that you are joking," replied the imperturbable Twizzleton. "My engagement with our charming hostess, whom I am agreeably surprised to see looking so well, is the only occupation I can look forward to to-night."

"Well," said Mrs. Carnegie, with a little toss of the hand, "of course you will have to dance with Cicely, but it is a little cool to inform me that you intend to favor nobody else—even though she be our hostess."

Mr. Twizzleton assumed an air of astonishment which would have done credit to any actor on the boards.

"I dance with her!" he exclaimed. "Surely, madam, I misunderstood you? I cannot believe that a lady would dream of dancing under such circumstances."

"And why not, pray?" inquired the widow.

"Because it would be the height of imprudence—I had almost said madness. So far from encouraging her, I should feel bound to forbid anything of the kind."

Mrs. Carnegie looking at Mr. Twizzleton's, unmoved features, and felt thoroughly mystified. She tried other lines of conversations but had no better success in persuading him to drop his assumed character.

Before dinner she was more than half convinced that he was not acting at all, and that the real author of the farce was Mr. Reggie Bunkum, who had amused himself by palming off this old fossil upon his cousin for a drawing-room comique.

When the ladies had retired, the male portion of the company tried their hands at drawing out Mr. Twizzleton; but as they succeeded no better than Mrs. Carnegie in getting behind his disguise, the opinion was very soon formed that the joke was a dismal failure, and that Mr. Twizzleton was making an egregious fool of himself. The last hope of getting any fun out of the thing expired on their return to the drawing-room. On being sounded respecting his banjo. Reggie Bunkum's boasted chum vehemently repudiated any knowledge of the instrument while a request from Mrs. Hardup for the "three dogs in a barrel" produced a look of hopeless bewilderment upon his features which was almost pathetic in its insanity.

In the meantime, however, the striking realization of Mr. Twizzleton's performance had made an impression on Jack Hardup somewhat similar to that on Mrs. Carnegie, only Jack's suspicions took a somewhat different direction from the widow's. When the gentlemen moved off to the drawing-room, the master of the house called Thompson, his trusty butler, on one side, and interrogated him closely as to Mr. Twizzleton's appearance on his arrival. The butler no sooner gathered that his master was perplexed about his new guest then he proceeded to unburden his own mind.

"Beg pardon, sir," he said "but do I understand as you think there is some mistake about Mr. Twizzleton?"

"He is not at all the sort of a gentleman I expected to see, Thompson. But why do you ask?"

"Because I see some things, sir, when I was unpacking the portmanteau that I don't like the look of at all."

"What sort of things?" inquired Hardup.

"Well, sir, p'raps as the gentleman are all in the drawing-room now, you wouldn't mind stepping upstairs and seeing for yourself. I can lay my hand on'em in a moment."

Jack reflected an instant, hesitating between the obligations of hospitality and anxiety to get to the bottom of the Twizzleton mystery. The latter motive prevailed, and he accordingly hurried up to Mr. Twizzleton's apartment, followed by the butler.

Thompson at once produced two black leather cases. Opening the first, Hardup found it to contain several mysterious looking instruments of the nature and purpose of which he was ignorant. In the second, however, he was startled to find a pair of desperate looking knives, with long blades highly polished, and as keen as razors. The very sight of them made Jack's blood run cold.

"Well Thompson," he said, more puzzled than ever, "what do you make of these?"

"'Taint for me to say, sir," replied the butler; "but I hope they don't mean murder, that's all."

"Murder! What do you mean?"

"Well, sir, if as you say you have your doubts about the gentleman being Mr. Twizzleton, all I can say is that some of these burglars and gentleman sharpers have precious artful ways of gettin' into folks' houses, and if those tools" (Thompson pointed to the first case) "ain't part of a burglar's stock-in-trade, I'm—"

"Nonsense Thompson!" interrupted his master. "You've got burglary on the brain. Put the things back and say nothing more about it."

With that Hardup made his way back to the drawing-room, feeling rather guilty. He found that Mr. Twizzleton was not in the room. Nor was Mrs. Hardup. Jack was told that Twizzleton had earnestly begged for five minutes' conversation with his hostess, and that they had gone together into the library only a moment ago. The company were busily discussing the mysterious stranger.

"I don't believe his face is made up at all," said one lady. "I could see wrinkles distinctly, and I'm sure he never hired such a bald head as that."

"My impression is that the whole thing is a joke of Reggie Bunkum's," observed Mrs. Carnegie, adhering to her previous theory.

"I believe," said Mr. Fred Jarvis, "that it is Reggie's friend, and that he has gone off his head. I have heard of cases where fellows have played the fool in this way until they have come to believe that they are somebody else."

At that moment a piercing shriek resounded through the house and library, causing the guests to look at one another with horrified glances. Followed by Mr. Jarvis and the rest of the gentleman, Hardup hurried away in the direction of the disturbance. Opening the library door, they found Mrs. Hardup, to all appearance, half fainting with terror, and clinging to the bell pull, while Mr. Twizzleton stood between her and the door, evidently scarcely less agitated.

"Oh, hold him! hold him?" shrieked the lady. "He's mad! He is going to murder me!"

There was certainly some reason for alarm, for on the table lay a case of weapons scarcely less formidable than those Hardup had seen upstairs.

"What is the meaning of this, sir?" cried Jack, while two or three gentlemen caustiously surrounded Mr. Twizzleton.

"My dear sir," replied the stranger, mopping the perspiration from his brow with a red silk handkerchief, "I'm as much at loss to understand matters as yourself. I desired to see your good lady in order to remonstrate on her imprudence in not taking more care of herself. On my producing my instruments for the purpose of making an examination, and asking to see her leg, she at once fell into the state of agitation which you perceive."

"Either you must be out of your mind, Mr. Twizzleton," exclaimed Hardup, angrily, "or this is the most impertinent fooling I ever—"

The sententeuce was cut short by the entrance of the butler. Jack was about to say that he could not be interrupted at this moment, but, on Thompson mysteriously whispering something in his ear, he made a hasty apology to the company, and left the room. In half a minute he returned accompanied by a gentleman of 24 or 25, in traveling clothes:

"Now, sir," said Hardup, addressing Mr. Twizzleton, "this gentleman" (indicating the new comer) "claims to be Mr. Charles Twizzleton, whom we expected by the 6.50 train at Bumpington this evening. It seems that, by some mistake, he has been taken elsewhere. Perhaps you can explain how it is that you have got there in his place and under his name?"

"If you will excuse me for a minute," interposed the new Twizzleton, "I think I can throw some light on the situation." Thereupon he informed the company how, on his arrival at Bumpington, he had been accosted by a man servant, who inquired whether he was "Mr. Twizzleton for Soakington," and on his replying in the affirmative, how he had been at once conveyed to a house four or five miles off, which he has since learned was the Manor House, Soakington.

"What an extraordinary mistake!" exclaimed Hardup. "How did you discover it?"

"As soon as I arrived a starchy-looking spinster met me, and pretty nearly threw me on my beam-ends by asking, in a solemn tone, whether I would look at mamma's leg at once or wait until Mr. Squills came. You see I concluded there must be a mistake somewhere. Squills arrived in half an hour. It turned out that he was the local doctor. The mamma, whose name I found was Seely, and not Hardup, had something wrong, it seems, with her left leg; and Squills, considering that amputation was necessary, had called on my eminent namesake, Dr. Theophilus Twizzleton, of Harley street, who was oddly enough expected by the same train as myself. Unless I am mistaken, Mr. Hardup, you have got him here."

On hearing this elder Mr. Twizzleton at once produced his card and handed it to Hardup, apoligizing at the same time for his intrusion:

"I am delighted, my dear madam," he said, turning to Mrs. Hardup, "that you have no occasion for my services. With your permission I will now go to poor Mrs. Seely, and leave my namesake to perform with the banjo and the three dogs in the barrel."

But he did not go. The hospitable Hardups insisted on making amends for his discomfiture by keeping him for the night and taking him to the Bumpington ball. There Mrs. Carnegie persuaded him to renew his dancing days, and devoted herself to consoling him with so much success that it is very likely there will soon be a Mrs. Twizzleton in Harley street

Miscalculation.

"John," said a wife who was supposed to be on her deathbed, "in case of my death I think a man of your temperament and domestic nature aside from the good of the children, ought to marry again." "Do you think so, my dear?" "I certainly do, after a reasonable length of time." "Well, now, do you know, my dear, that relieves my mind of a great burden. The little Widow Jenkins has acted rather demure toward me ever since you were taken sick. She is not the woman that you are, of course, a strongminded, intelligent woman of character, but she is plump and pretty, and I am sure she would make me a very desirable wife." The next day Mrs. John was able to sit up, the following day she went down stairs, and on the third day was planning for a new dress.—New York Sun.

A Toper's Paradise.

The town of Arroyo Grande is on the boundary line between Arizona and Mexico, a fact which enables the topers to work an old game. They step into a saloon on the Arizona side and ask for a drink, laying down an American dollar. The chances are that the bartender will give him a Mexican dollar in change, it being worth only 90 cents. Then they strike a saloon on the Mexican side and tender the Mexican dollar for a drink, getting an American dollar for change, which in this case is worth only 90 cents. The truthful editor of the Arizona Howler says that the practice has broken up all the saloons in the town.

On election day, although then thought to be near to death, he insisted upon being carried to the polls, that he might once more vote the Republican ticket.

Funeral Ceremonies in Paris.

In all countries death and the ceremonies of burial are sad and repulsive. In France, perhaps decency is observed as well as in any county, thanks to the excellent organization of the Compagnie des Pompes Funebres, which forms, so to speak, the administration of the churches in Paris, exercising on their behalf the monopoly of funeral ceremonies. This company, whose monopoly is regulated by law, is a vast enterprise, possessed of exceptional resources an immense number of horses and carriages, a numerous and well-disciplined personnel. Every year it takes charge of about 50,000 funerals, about half of which are those of the poor. Thanks to this enterprise, even the poorest citizens are buried with some show of decency and in conformity with strict rules. The administration of the Pompes Funebres is situated in Paris in the Quaie d'Aubervilliers. It is a big, heavy, white stone building, built round a vast grass-roofed court yard. To the right and left of the entrace doors are the offices of the director and the bookkeeping department. In the court yards are the storerooms, the stables, the coach-houses and the harness-rooms. Everything is black, sombre and silent; everything is rigorously numbered and ticketed, classified and arranged for immediate use. The porteurs, or bearers, commonly called croquemorts, have a big room furnished with oak benches, where they assemble every morning 400 in number, to await orders, gloomy, serious, clad in various styles, some with blouses, but most of them in jackets. Over this room are other rooms, with cupboards running down the middle in double rows. Each cupboard is numbered and fitted with a lock, the key of which the correspondingly numbered croquemort keeps. In these cupboards are kept the uniforms of the bearers, who dress before going out on service and undress when their service is over, only wearing their regulation costume while on duty.

The masters of cermonies have each a private room to dress in. Their uniform consists of a cocked hat, coat, knee-breeches, silk stockings, buckled shoes, a court sword and a wand. This personage is paid by the day, so much for each funeral. His duty is to arrange the procession in proper order, to fix the order of the precedence among the mourners, and to start the funeral. Beneath the vast building of the Pompes Funebres are cellars dimly lighted with gas jets, and full of rows and rows of coffins of all sizes and quantities. This cellar contains a stock of 15,000 coffins ready for use, varying in length from six feet 2½ inches down to 27½ inches, which are the regulation maximum and minimum sizes of dead French humanity. For persons taller than six feet 2½ inches a coffin has to be built on purpose and to order. On one side of the cellar are the lead coffins, and in one corner a stock of square boxes in which coffins are packed for traveling by rail or steamer without attracting attention. Near the door of the cellar are some hugh coffins, with a circumference of six or nine feet, destined for the accommodation of very obese corpses. Likewise near the door are thirty hand-carts of peculiar form, on two wheels, painted green and lined with black; these carts are used only when some terrible epidemic is decimating the population. The price of the coffins, of the inner lining and of the covering pall, are all regulated by an immutable tariff. In 1873, during the siege, the little hand-carts, painted green and lined with black, had to serve universally as hearses, for all the horses had been killed for food.—New York Mail and Express.

Women Not Cowards.

"Do the passengers who ride up with you ever become frightened asked a Star reporter of the elevator conductor at the Washington monument the other day.

"Some do and some do not," was the reply, as the cable-puller turned to explain to a lady in the car that the trip upward occupied about nine minutes. "I'll tell you," he explained, turning back to the reporter. "The first lady who became frightened in the monument came the other day. She was the first and only one. We had hardly started from the floor when she began to get nervous, and kept getting more and more so, and, finally, asked me to let her off. Of course I could not go back, so I kept on to the first landing, two or three levels higher, and there I opened the door and led her out to the platform. She was very nervous. I did not want to leave her there alone, so I called to a nice looking young man who was walking down and asked him if he would not stay with her until I could get to the top and send a watchman down to help her. He said he would and I went on. When the watchman went down he could not find them; she had walked down with the young man."

Here the conductor had to interrupt himself to reassure a man huddled away back in the corner of the car, that the same elevator had carried tons and tons of stone to the top of the monument, and had been pronounced perfectly safe by all the authorities. Then he resumed, lowering his voice somewhat as he said: "On the other hand I have had to stop at least twenty times for the benefit of men who would not go any higher. Why, I have seen great big, strong men, who looked as though they weren't afraid of anything, get to trembling, and finally ask me to let them get off and walk. Particularly fat men, too," with a reminiscent chuckle. "Fat men are afraid of their weight, particularly if they are with a large crowd. I can't explain why this should be," he concluded, just as the car emerged from the semi-darkness of the shaft into the whiter brighter light of the top landing; "but I must say that I've come to the conclusion that the women are not the cowards, after all; its the men. If the women are they don't show it here."

A Terrible Experience.

Upper Stony Kill (N. Y.) Corr.

Up here in the sombre, rugged Shawnagunks hoop pole cutting is becoming quite an industry. Chase Wagonen, who lives here, tramps seven miles daily to his "hoop ranch," which is situated in a gloomy desolate locality known as Pollymezottee; just west of the famous Dark Hole. Several times Van Wagonen has been obliged to go dinnerless, owing to the depredations of quadrupeds who roam about in vast numbers and comparatively unmolested. A few days ago Van Wagonen took his son, the eldest of several children, with him for company and to watch his dinner. Young Joshua and his father reached their destination soon after daybreak, and while the elder began his daily task, "Josh" busied himself kindling a roaring fire around which he built a wall of stones.

At noon a hearty dinner was eaten. Van Wagonen returned to his work, and Joshua, after replenishing the fire, armed himself with his father's trusty rifle and started out in search of adventure and small game. The sturdy little chap had tramped about three miles when he heard an ugly grunt and saw at the same time a wild boar that had been taking a siesta on a pile of sunny leaves. There was an oak tree near by, and "Josh's" legs did good service in climbing to a place of safety among its branches. In his haste he dropped the rifle, and when he glanced downward the boy's heart turned sick with fear. All about were sheltered nests of leaves, which he knew well would be occupied at night by a score of wild hogs. The boar was still on the watch, and unless he should relax his vigil all escape was shut off.

Scream after scream and pitiful cries for help met with no response, and before an hour passed the hogs began gathering, and night closed in dark and cold. The wind cut like a razor, and little "Josh" was obliged to rub his already peeled legs against the tree bark to keep them from freezing. All through that long, dreary night the boy kicked and moved about on his high perch to keep the blood from congealing in his veins; but toward morning his strength gave out, and when rescued by his father and a band of Shawnagunk Mountain hunters the child was lifted from a terribly perilous position into which he had fallen while asleep. One foot dangled within three feet of the boar's reach. The child was carried home more dead than alive, and for several days lay in a perilous condition. The boy says it was light before he went asleep, so that he must have fallen when rescued. The wild boar and three other hogs were shot by the hunters.

Perils of Society Girls.

Gail Hamilton.

"What are society's perils for young women?" I just asked a "society girl," and she said: "In Washington, lack of men." For girls this is true. There are plenty of men in Washington. Perhaps in no city in the United States is society worth so much while as in Washington, because so many distinguished men gather there. In no party do you fail to see groups any one member of which would be worth making a feast for in other cities. But the distinguished men of Washington scarcely come at an earlier period than their early middle life. They are in Washington because they have already won more or less eminence. They are past the uncertainty, the hesitancy, the unreality of life, and are bent on definite pursuits. The young men, the natural mates for the girls, are in other cities and districts practicing law, learning to edit newspapers, cantering over cattle ranches, preaching sermons to young women and probably making a poor fist of it, exploring mines, earning money, winning fame. By and by they will come to Washington, but in that day our girls will not be girls any more. A few of these young men are in Washington, but very few, hardly enough to go around. Consequently, a girl who goes into society encounters the peril of not finding many stimulating minds among her younger comrades. And there are perils of 5 o'clock teas, ruinous to digestion, and always the peril of confounding the cakes and candies of life with its roast beef. "Society" is so fascinating that girls are in danger of forgetting that it is refreshment and rest, not steady work.

A Useful Caution.

The Sanitary News calls attention to the fact that a postage stamp may in various ways convey contagion. One of the simplest and most plausible is that in which a postage partially attached to a letter by pay return postage, is sent by a person infected with some disease to another person. The disease is transferred in the first place to the adhesive stamp through the saliva, and is being attached by the receiver the poison may be transmitted to him in turn through the saliva. Another cause may be the infection of the stamp with disease germs. The stamp, having been exposed in a room where a diseased person lies, may become slightly moistened and thus retain the germ. That this is true can be proved very simply by a microscopical examination. We often see a person holding change for a moment in the mouth, probably not knowing that investigation has shown that disease germs can be carried by money. If one could see through what hands the money has passed he would hesitate before using such a third hand. Silver money is as bad as paper money, but while many would hesitate to hold a dirty bank note in their mouth, they think that a silver piece, because bright, is probably clean.

THE GOLD PIECE,

OR

The Newsboy's Temptation.

BY H. A.

"Herald, Globe, Journal, Transcript!" Such was the cry of a newsboy on State street one cold morning on December last. He was a boy of ten or eleven, judging from his appearance. His face was more prepossessing than we usually find among the fraternity of newsboys. The boyish expression had not given place to the prococious hardness and shrewd air of business which such an occupation is apt to give. In fact, George Dunn had not been a newsboy. The sudden death of his father, and the utter destitution in which his mother had been left, compelled him to leave school and devote himself to this, the most remunerative occupation open to a boy of his age. It had been a great disappointment to him, for he was fond of study; but necessity is a law unto the poor, and he must, perforce, obey that.

"Herald, Globe, Journal, Transcript!"

Again rose the cry of the young newsboy, as the throng passed by him on their way to the postoffice or to their places of business.

A stout good-looking man passed him, and then, as if struck by a sudden thought, turned back and inquired:

"Did you say you had the Transcript, my boy?"

"Yes, sir; here is one," said George, promptly.

"And how much do you ask for it?"

"Three cents a copy, sir."

The gentleman took the paper, and handed the boy three new cents, apparently. George put them hastily into his vest pocket, being in a hurry to wait on another customer.

The gentleman who had purchased of him was on his way to the postoffice, and George saw no more of him that day.

A moment or two afterward he required some cents to make change for a new customer. As there were not enough in the pocket where he kept the most of his change, he drew out the three cents which had been given him by the gentleman above referred to.

He was just on the point of handing them to the new customer, when his attention was attracted to one of the coins. What was his astonishment on discovering it to be a quarter eagle, which, as the reader knows, is of about the same size as one of the new cents.

George's first feeling was that of delighted surprise. He related the incident to the next newsboy.

"Well, you're in luck," was the comment. "I'd just like to have somebody make such a mistake in giving me change—I'll tell you what I'd do."

"What would you do?"

"I'd just invite two or three other newsboys to have a good oyster stew."

The speaker looked cunningly at George, to see if he took the hint.

George seemed to be in deep thought.

"Come, old fellow, what do you say to it?"

"Why," said George, "it was a mistake, as you say. I don't know as I ought to keep it."

"Oh, gammon," rejoined his companion; "he ought to have known better. Besides, you don't know who it was."

"Yes, I do; for I was in a hurry, and put it in a different place from what I was accustomed to."

"Would you know him again?"

"I would be sure to."

"Well, I hope you ain't such a fool as to think of giving him the money back."

"Wouldn't you?" asked George, in a state of indecision.

"Catch me doing such a right-down foolish thing! If I did, I'd give anybody leave to send me to the 'sylum right off."

Probably the newsboy meant the insane asylum.

"Come, you'll have the oyster supper, won't you, and invite me?" the young gentleman proceeded in an insinuating tone.

"No," said George, shaking his head. "I can't afford it. If I keep the money, I'll buy a new pair of shoes with it. These are out at the toes."

Evidently the way of disposing of the money did not meet the approbation of the young gentleman, who had advised the retaining of the money. He marched off with an air of mingled disappointment at the loss of the anticipated oysters, and disgust at George's want of taste.

George did not adopt his companion's advice without a momentary qualm of conscience. He could distinguish the right from the wrong sufficiently to be sure that the course he desired to adopt was not consistent with strict honesty. Nevertheless, he did need the shoes—there was no doubt about that. His feet had already suffered from the cold not a little, in consequence of being insufficiently covered, and the moderate sum which he daily earned by the sale of newspapers had to go in so many ways—for food, rent and fuel—that it was a matter of great uncertainty when he would be able to save enough out of it to provide himself with the desired article. Six months previous, George would not have hesitated at all. Then his father's income, though not large, was sufficient to provide the family with all the comforts of life. It is easier to do right, when it requires only the surrender of a luxury, than when it involves the giving up of an article necessary to comfort.

So George Dunn concluded to keep the money. "I'm sure it will do me a great deal more good than it will him," he thought, though it must be confessed this did not entirely satisfy him.

On the way home to dinner, George stepped into a store on Dock square and purchased a pair of stout shoes, for which he paid a dollar and a half.

"That will leave me a dollar to buy something for mother," he thought; "but I guess I'll wait till I get home, and see what she most wants."

George did not put on his shoes at once, but had them wrapped in a paper to carry home.

"See, mother," he said with complacency, as he entered the little room they called home; "see what I have bought this morning."

"A pair of shoes," said Mrs. Dunn. "They seem a good, stout pair, and you needed them very much. But how came you by money enough to buy them? You must have been unusually successful this morning."

"This isn't all," said George. "Here's another dollar, and with that I am going to buy something for you, mother. Tell me what do you most want?"

"My dear boy, you are very kind," said his mother, looking tenderly at George's bright earnest face; "but you surely could not have received all this money for selling papers."

"Yes, I did, mother," said George, hesitating. Then, after a moment, he added, "but I don't want to deceive you. It was through a mistake."

"Through mistake?"

"Yes, mother. You see, a gentleman gave me a quarter-eagle by mistake, for one of the new cents."

"You surely did not feel at liberty to keep it, then," said his mother, with an expression of pain.

"Why, I did think of giving it back," said George, slowly; "but one of the other newsboys told me I should be a fool if I did."

"Is he such a boy as to make his advice valuable?"

"I don't know as he is a very good boy," said George, slowly and reluctantly. "He swears awfully sometimes, and is pretty quarrelsome."

"And yet you took his advice?"

"To tell the truth," said George, candidly, "I suppose I did it because I wanted to. If he had advised me against my wishes, I don't believe I should have taken up with it."

"I dare say you are right, George."

"What shall I do about it, mother? I've gone and spent part of the money?"

"For your shoes?"

"Yes."

"I am afraid you'll have to carry them to the store, and see if they won't take them back."

"But I need them so much, mother."

"That is true, George; but you need to be honest more. But perhaps we can manage to get you the shoes, at least, before long. Here is a gold ring you can pawn for a dollar, and you can make up the rest."

"But, mother, that is the ring father gave you."

"I know it," said Mrs. Dunn, as a momentary cloud swept over her face, "but perhaps we can redeem it again by and-bye."

"No, mother; keep the ring. I'll try to save enough out of selling papers, and perhaps I can get some odd jobs to do. My old shoes will last me a week or two longer."

"But if you shouldn't be able to save enough, I shall insist on you taking the ring."

"We'll see about that, mother. But now, if you will give me some dinner, I'll be carrying back these shoes."

Half an hour afterward, George re-entered the shoe store."

"Are you willing to take back these shoes?" he enquired.

"Don't they fit?" asked the clerk.

"Yes, they fit like a glove."

"Then, why don't you keep them? They are well-made, and will do you good service."

George was in an embarrassing position. He hardly knew what to say. In such cases, however, the truth always makes the best impression, and though a little reluctant, he at length determined to tell it.

"The fact is," said George, "I like the shoes first rate, and I wish that I could keep them, but the money I bought them with was not mine."

"Was not yours? You don't look as if you would steal."

"Not quite so bad as that; but a gentleman handed me a piece of gold by mistake for a new cent this morning. I at first thought I had a right to keep it, and spend it, but I have thought of it again, and I don't think it would be honest. So, if you will be kind enough to take back the shoes, and give me the same piece. I will be much obliged."

"Don't you do any such thing!" said a voice just behind the boy.

Both George and the clerk looked around in astonishment, at this unexpected and apparently not very polite interruption. But George had the most reason to be surprised, for in the one who laid claim to the voice he recognized the very gentleman who had given him the wrong change.

"It was you who gave me the gold piece," said George, walking up to him. "You must excuse me for thinking of keeping it, but—"

And here George cast an involuntary glance at his well-ventilated shoes.

"Excuse you, my lad, said the gentleman, kindly. "If there is any fault in the matter, you have nobly repaired it by your after-repentance."

"I'll give you back the gold in a moment. sir, if the clerk will take back the shoes."

"No, you won't. You must regard that gold piece as a present. It is due to your honesty. What is your name?"

"George Dunn."

"Well, George, do you like to be a newsboy?"

"Not much, sir."

"Then why are you one?"

"My mother is very poor, and I can make more money that way than any other."

"How much can you make?"

"About three dollars a week."

"And does this support you?"

"With a little that my mother earns, by sewing, sir."

"Would you be willing to change your business?"

"Yes, sir I would be glad to, for anything that would pay as well."

"Then, George, hark you. I am a merchant, I want a boy in my counting room. I can get plenty for a small sum, but I have taken a fancy to you. If you will enter my employment, I will give you five dollars a week."

"Are you in earnest?" asked George, scarcely crediting his luck.

"In very serious earnest."

"Oh, sir, you have made me so happy, and my mother will be so glad! I am sure I do not deserve it."

"I will tell you what prompts me to make the offer. In the first place, what I have seen of you fills me with confidence in your good principles. Secondly, I have not forgotten that I came to the city a poor boy myself. and I endeavor to show my gratitude to God for the prosperity with which He has crowned my efforts, by lending a helping hand to those who are in the same position I once was. Now we understand each other. Will you come to-morrow morning? Here is my address."

Two months have passed. The quondam newsboy may be seen, neatly dressed, in the counting room of the benevolent merchant. Let us hope that he will be true to his good principles, and their can be little doubt of his future success.

The Ideal Woman.

A man's ideal woman bends
  In homage to her lord,
She praises him before their friends,
  With tact in act and word.

Man's ideal woman you'll not see
  In crowded marts of trade
Though strong in mind, perhaps, as he
  She is a modest maid.

To make him happy, all her schemes,
  Her talk diverse, she oft
To suit his mood should change her theme,
  Wise, practical, or soft.

Without apparent effort she Seems always bright and sunny,
She dresses neat and charmingly
  Yet never asks for money.

In fact, man's ideal woman will
  All of her own accord
  Full many a hundred dollar bill
  Earn and present her lord.

To learn his tastes she should apply,
  And often must appear
His favorite pudding, perch or pie,
  "Because you like it, dear,

If he should deem it well to raise
  Sons, daughters, seven or eight,
Her range to knowledge should embrace
  Whate'er will make them great.

When age comes on and ills grow worse,
  She should his faith sustain,
His guide, consoler, patient nurse,
  Suppressing her own pain.

A woman's ideal woman! Ah,
  'Tis one whose charms have fled,
Or those whose form inspires with awe,
  In short—a woman dead.

An Innovation for Weddings.

The latest novelty at fashionable weddings is for the bridesmaids to carry satin shoes filled with flowers, and the result is charmingly pretty. At one wedding the shoes were of eau de Nil satin and were filled with plush-pink roses. At another there was a very effective combination of pink satin, and maze colored roses, while the structure depended from the bridesmaid's arm by pink satin ribbons, like a veritable minature hanging-garden. At a third the shoes are pink satin, and the flowers were golden-brown chrysanthemums, toning from dark brown to pale yellow. In some cases these shoe bouquets take the place of ordinary posies; in others they are merely supplementary to huge clusters of flowers carried in the hand; sometimes however, by way of intensifying the novelty of innovation, the bridesmaids are divided into two detachments, half carrying shoes filled with flowers, and the other half being supplied with bouquets of the regulation pattern.—London Life.

Hadn't Caught on Yet.

Old lady (to grocer'a boy); "I see you're sellin' off some of your goods below cost." Boy: "Yes'm." Old lady: "Well how can you make money on goods that you sell less'n cost?" Boy: "I dun know, marm; I've only bin in the grocery business a week. The boss is in the back room; p'r'aps he can tell you."—Harper's Bazar.

Why He Ate Them.

"My little boy," said a gentleman. "You ought not to eat those green apples. They are no good for little boys." "They hain't, eh?" the boy replied with his mouth full. "Guess you don't know much about 'em, mister. Three of these apples 'll keep me out of schoo' for a week."

Her Other Name.

"Pop, is Queen Victoria's other name Lize?"

"No, my son. Why do you ask?"

"Why, you know Shakspeare was an Englishman, and I've just heard you reading where he says: 'Uneasy Lize, the head that wears the crown,' and Victoria wears the crown, doesn't she?" —Texas Siftings.

"More Light."

The drop-a-nickel-in-the-slot mania has taken a new phase in London, where it is proposed to furnish gas light to the poor at the rate of six hours' light to the burner for a penny. In six hours a burner will consume thirty-six feet. At the rate of a penny this would be in our money fifty-six cents a thousand feet—less than half the cost with us.—Indianapolis News.

Preserving the Unities.

A prominent army officer, whose command is stationed at San Antonio and whose name we charitably suppress, recently passed through Austin returning from a leave of absence and dropped into a photopraph gallery to have his picture taken. The artist brought out some books to place on the table beside which the officer was to sit during the process.

"Here, none of them," said the soldier.

"But, my dear sir, it will hardly look well to have the table bare."

"It won't eh?" said the officer; "then put a pack of cards, a bottle of whisky and some glasses on the table. I want to see the unities preserved."—Texas Siftings.

Romance of a Ring.

A few months ago a traveling salesman named Woods, who was a guest of the Boody house in this city, was sitting upon the sofa in his room, absorbed in reflection. While carelessly running his hand behind the upholstery in the sofa he felt a small finger ring which he drew forth and discovered to be a gold finger ring with a diamond setting.

He naturally began wondering how the little treasure found its way into so remote a place, and after considerable thinking came to the conclusion that it had been hidden intentionally or that it had slipped from a finger of the owner—evidently a lady, for it was a lady's ring—while she had thoughtlessly been toying with the upholstery.

He found nothing that would lead to the indentity of the owner, and upon inquiry no one was found who knew anything of it.

The next morning Mr Woods was preparing his toilet, when he noticed the letters "M. C. F.," and the date "Sept. 17," delicately cut in the mirror. He thought nothing of it at the time, but shortly afterward the idea entered his mind that the initials might possibly be those of the owner of the ring he had found. He determined to investigate the romance.

From the clerk he obtained the register for last September, and looked, through the list of names for one the initials of which M. C. F. Nothing satisfactory was found. He asked for the register of the September previous, and under the date of Sept. 16, he saw the name, in a lady's handwriting, "Miss May C. Fowler, Madison, Wis.," and she was assigned to room 45, the very one he had occupied.

Then he was certain that this young lady was the same who had engraved her initials on the mirror. The doubt still remained if she was the owner of the ring he had found.

His first intention was to address a letter to the lady named, but as he was going to Chicago and Milwaukee he concluded to run over to Madison and investigate in person.

He did so. From the city directory he selected the address of Russell M. Fowler, attorney-at-law.

He presented himself at the residence and asked if Miss May Fowler was at home. He received an affirmative reply, and was ushered into a room where the young lady was sitting with her father.

Woods introduced himself and asked Miss Fowler if she ever lost a diamond ring. After hesitating a moment she said:

"Yes, sir. I lost one two years ago on a visit east. I don't know where, though."

"Were you ever in Toledo, O?"

"Yes. I stopped there over night while on my trip, and waited for the next evening for papa. You remember, don't you, father?"

"Quite well," the lawyer replied.

"Where did you stop?" asked Woods.

"I don't remember the name of the hotel, but it was in the center of the city."

Mr. Fowler then eyed him suspiciously, and asked why he was so inquisitive.

The drummer replied by handing the young lady the ring, and asking if it was hers.

"Oh, the very same," was the reply.

"Where did you get it, Mr. Woods?"

Woods related the circumstances as recorded above, and concluded with the remark that he hoped Miss Fowler found as much pleasure in obtaining the ring as he had derived in following the little mystery.

Mr. Fowler gave himself up to a hearty laugh, at the same time thanking Woods for his kindness.

Woods was invited to remain for dinner, and he did so. He made himself very agreeable and was cordially invited to call again.

About three weeks later he found himself in Madison again on his return trip from the west. He was well received by the Fowlers, and introduced by them to some of the best people in Madison. It was nearly three months before his next trip in that vicinity, and he was surprised at the anxiety he seemed to feel to accept the invitation he had received to present himself at the Fowler mansion.

But what is the necessity of saying anything more? It was the most natural thing in the world for the young people to fall in love with so romantic an introduction. And they did.

And to-day Miss Fowler's name is changed to Mrs. Greene Woods. —Toledo Blade.

She Swallowed The Car Fare.

If there is any one thing that makes the horse-car conductor mad it is the custom of some folks of using their mouths as purses for the car fares. It is a great nuisance in Summer during travel on the open cars, where the conductor has a full complement of passengers. H. Lewiston conductor says that children are the worst. Some of them disgorge a handful of change, and he has to accept it. One day a very pretty young lady, who was a guest in Auburn from a Massachusetts town, was coming down from the lake. She was one of a gay party of half a dozen, and they made merry on the down trip. When he was one seat from her on his tour of the car he looked over at her. She was so pretty she could not help it. Just as he looked he was pained to notice a fearful change in her countenance. Her cheek blanched and she seemed to choke. Her laugh died on her lips, too, and joked no more. When he got along to the party the young lady's eyes were bedewed with tears. "I—I had some money—" The conductor, with infinite tact, says that he just passed it along, saying:" I know all about it. You've swallered it. I see you do it." The young lady blushed, and the car rattled along. A child with five coppers in its mouth is a fearful picture for the conductor. but what do you think of one with twenty-four cents in its cheeks? Better buy youngsters ten-cent purses.—Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

The bill providing for the reduction of interest from 10 to 8 per cent. has probably got its quietus, as it does not seem to have friends enough in the Legislature to save it from indefinite postponement.

The prospects for re-apportionment during the present session seem to be good. Under the proposed plan, Polk, Norman and Beltrami Counties will have one senator and three representatives.

The drainage bill, in its present form, does not suit us at all. It calls for the expenditure of $25,000 each year for four years, evenly distributed over the entire district. It seems to us as though this method would tend to fritter the whole amount away without doing the good it ought. Instead of being placed in the hands of the county commissioners, the work should be done by special commissioners, and that as soon as possible.

Warren Register: In reply to Bro. Cooke's article in last week's POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, we are ready to admit that Senator Sabin acted the part of a high-toned, honorable gentleman, in regard to the senatoral caucus and election, so far as we know the facts, and that we now have a much better opinion of the man, than ever before. We will further say that we always had "suspicions" that Sabin played Senator Windom false when he became his successor, and consequently have been prejudiced against him, it may be, unjustly.

The Duluth & Winnipeg.

One of the most important events for this country, if not the most important, would be the building of an independent line of road direct to Duluth. For years our people have been longing and hoping for the coming of the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad but each year has seen that hope doomed to disappointment for reasons beyond the control of the management. At last sufficient capital has been enlisted to make a start, and, if the land grant that has been given the road is not declared forfeited enough more can be secured to complete the road within a short time. The building of that road would not only be a grand thing for this country but to the the whole state by opening up a vast tract of country now utterly useless and the same reasons exist for extending the time to the company as existed for giving it the grant in the first place. In endorsing the resolutions in favor of this our citizens have taken an action that if successful will do more for the upbuilding of our county than anything they have done of late, an action that they will never have occasion to regret. They should not stop at this but should use their influence with the members in the legislature with whom they are acquainted to urge the killing of the forfeiture bill now before that body and for the passage of an act extending the time for the D. & W. to complete its line. A strong united action now would do much to secure the building of the line and afford us another and a shorter outlet to Duluth. In a few short weeks it will be too late and what we do must be done now.

That Interview Agair.

Northfield News.

From all over the state come expressions of disgust at Mr. Washburn's wholesale slander of tried and true republicans. There are thousands of republicans who are manly and independent, and who do not bend the knee in quiet submission whenever a man ambitious to become a political despot chooses to crack his handy political whip. It sounds like a burlesque to hear a man whose garments are tinged with corruption accuse others of bribetaking. The interview by Mr. Washburn is handled in the following extract from the Winona Republican in a fair manner. The editor, Mr. D. Sinclair, is one of the fairest and most courageous editors in the state, and his words carry much weight:

"In one of Mr. Washburn's Twin City organs; just after that gentleman had been elected to the United States senate, there appeared what purported to be an interview, in which he was made to use the following language: "Outside of the members of the house and senate Sabin had scarcely a known and recognized republican to uphold him. His following was made up of the mercenary men of the party, political strumpets like Charley Gilman, and others of the same caliber. I should have been prouder to have been beaten with the men who aided me than to have won with that class of backing. St. Paul might have raised the sectional issue against me, but generously refrained from it."

Referring to these sentiments as attributed to the senator-elect, Mr. Joel P. Heatwole, secretary of the Republican State Central committee, and one of the most honorable and influential of the young republicans of Minnesota, in a lengthy article in The Northfield News, sharply criticises Mr. Washburn for his apparent lack of magnanimity, to say nothing of the want of tact which is essential to continued success on the part of any man who aspires to wield political influence on an extended scale. Mr. Heatwole, who is usually very temperate in his judgment, and rarely allows himself to speak harshly, even of his "most devoted enemy," remarks that his worst fears are already realized in Mr. Washburn. It had been predicted by him that if Mr. Washburn proved successful "he would get insolent and seek to punish all who did not fall down and worship at his feet." Mr. Heatwole accordingly declares that the interview of which the foregoing extract is a sample "is an insult to any man who honestly supported Mr. Sabin or opposing candidate," and intimates rather plainly that it ought not to be tamely swallowed or submitted to. With some indignation he inquires: "Is this the sort of person that Minnesota has sent to the senate?" And then he proceeds to give a list of representative men throughout the state who, for reasons satisfactory to themselves, the honesty and purity of which reasons and the motives accompanying them not even a senator-elect has the right to question, opposed Mr. Washburn in the interest of Mr. Sabin or of some other candidate hostile to the principle of political concentration represented by the twin city candidate. This list is too lengthy for reproduction here, but it may be said that it embraces the names of many well known and even eminent republicans scattered from Winona to Moorhead and from Luverne to Duluth —republicans to whom the epithets found in the interview above quoted from are as inapplicable and grossly insulting as the term bribe-giver would unquestionably be if used in connection with the honored name of Mr. Washburn himself. These men, as Mr. Heatwole, says, are men of character and standing in the state, and besides them there are many thousands of others who are in full sympathy with all in connection with the senatorial contest they have done and said. It is not surprising, therefore, that the question is asked: "How do the people like such utterances of the newly-elected senator?"

So far as the Republican is concerned, it refrains now from answering this pointed interrogetory. If it could be assured that Mr. Washburn really thought and spoke as he is represented by one of his local organs to have done, it would not for a moment hesitate to give its reply and in such terms as might easily be understood by any who should care to listen to it. But there is room for honest doubt. Was Mr. Washburn correctly reported by his over-zealous mouth-piece? We prefer first to learn authoritatively whether this is the case or not. To a very large body of loyal and honorable republicans in all parts of the state the senator-elect owes a straightforward, unequivocal statement on this point. We incline to the belief that it will be promptly forthcoming, and of such character as to fully exonerate Mr. Washburn from the serious imputation that he begins his senatorial career by slandering as a class men whose honor and honesty, alike in political and in business life, have hitherto been untainted with even so much as the breath of ungenerous suspicion."

The interview was first published in the Minneapolis Tribune, Mr. Washburn's leading organ, and was given as correct; the same day it appeared in the Minneapolis Journal and St. Paul Dispatch, and on Saturday Mr. Alvah Eastman, one of the inside Washburn managers, placed the stamp of "genuine" upon it by printing it in his Anoka Herald. It may have been that Mr. Washburn was drunk with success and his true inward feelings got the better of him. The interview has not been denied.

A Crying Need of Reform.

The National Tribune.

Scarcely less obnoxious than the pension policy of the present administration has been its homestead policy. It has only been less obnoxious because the number of people who were distressed by its injustice was smaller. In the homestead policy was the same degrading estimate of the people whose rights were trampled upon, the same aspersions of their character, the same reckless denunciation of them as a class of unscrupulous robbers, public plunderers and perjurers, which characterized the pension vetoes. There was the some resort to all manner of technicalities and pretexts to avoid giving the homesteaders their rights.

Never since the foundation of our government have settlers upon the public lands been treated with such harsh injustice. Previous to this administration they have been regarded as a most estimable class of people, who should be encouraged and protected in all proper ways. Their success ment the development of the country, the erection of new and prosperous states, the rapid increase of the national wealth and well-being.

But this administration—properly represented in the general land office by Commissioner Sparks, of unsavory memory—has treated the man who left the east to build up a home on the western prairies as a sort of brigand, who was to be curbed, repressed and defeated, if possible, in his machinations against the country. Never have so many obstacles been thrown in the way of the honest settler striving to acquire a little tract of land for a home for himself and family. Never have the laws enacted to encourage and protect him in this praise-worthy ambition been construed so harshly and so adversely to their real spirit and intent.

It is very gratifying to know that Gen. Harrison is fully advised as to this condition of affairs. To a delegation representing the homesteaders which visited him in Indianapolis he said that he knew of the truth of which they spoke; that he had investigated the subject with care, and had visited the western pioneers in their sod-houses, examining their condition for himself. He saw the necessity for radical improvement in the public land policy.

This reform must be made by the Secretary of the Interior, whose subordinate the commissioner of the land office is. The headquarters—among whom are tens of thousands of old soldiers—scrutinize anxiously the possible appointees to this place. He is the most important officer of the government, so far as they are immediately concern.

So far the manifestations from the class immediately interested, have been overwhelmingly in favor of the selection of Hon. John M. Thurston, of Nebraska, for the head of the Interior department. The people of Nebraska, among whom is as large a proportion of homesteaders as in any State, are a unit in his favor. Both the senators, and all the congressmen from the state, the republican members of the legislature, and the state officials are solid for him. Kansas, Colorado, Idaho, Wyoming, Montana and Dakota are equally favorable to him, and the present indications are that Iowa will assume a like attitude. This makes the homesteaders as a body practically united upon him.

So far as cearacter and abilities go no man in the country is better fitted for the place. He is the son of a veteran. His father—a devotedly patriotic man —came back from the field only to die at home before the was closed. His sympathy with the veterans is strong and deep. He has lived all his life in the far west, and is familiar with the public land question in all its phases and with the condition and rights of the homesteaders. He is heartily in unison with them. His legal ability and personal character are of the highest type. There is no abler lawyer in the whole country, and no man whose career is freer from any taint. We do not say that he will be the best secretary of the Interior that can be found. We only say that no better one can be found.

Kittson County Enterprise: Capt. John A. Vanstrum, ex-sheriff of this county has taken his departure. He has bidden his many friends a final good bye, and is now looking up a new location. In his departure Kittson County looses one of its most trustworthy citizens, and there are few men that will be more greatly missed than the genial, whole-souled Captain. During the last year several of the old land marks of the county have sought other fields and by those remaining it is deeply regretted. Such men are needed in our midst. There was L. N. Eklund, one of the most influential and wealthy men of the county, he has located in Washington Territory. Capt. Eustrom, L. W. Bristol, H. Hanson, Capt. Vanstrum and Scott Riddell, have or will find homes elsewhere.

Pioneer Press: Ernest W. Huffcut, the Minneapolitan who has the distinction of being appointed judge advocate general on Gov. Merriam's staff, is the same young man who held the mob in check by his eloquence at Harmonia hall on Tuesday evening, a scene strongly suggestive of the occasion of Garfield's famous speech, "The government at Washington still lives." Mr. Huffcut has had the misfortune to have his name spelled in as many different ways as it will bear being spelled, but the right way is as above: two "ffs" and only one "t." He is a young man about twenty-eight years of age, possessed of marked ability in the line of oratory. During the recent campaign in Minnesota he did yeoman service for the republican ticket. His ability on the stump was due to some extent to the experience he had in New York State. Mr. Huffcut was graduated from Cornell university in 1884 and was instructor in rhetoric and composition in that university for three years. He was for a year previous to becoming an instructor private secretary to Andrew D. White, the president of the university. He is an occasional contributor to a few prominent periodicals and the author of a valuable little monograph treating of the loose instruction of English in the public schools.

Success in Life.

Philadelphia Ledger.

However widely the various ambitions of people may differ, one from another, there is a unanimity of purpose in the desire for success. The aim will vary with the individual; there will be the desire for wealth the longing for present applause or perpetual fame, the hope of benefitting our fellow-beings, the yearning for intellectual riches, the thirst for the purity and nobleness of life. Whether the impulse is strong or weak, according to our make-up, the desire for success in that which is dearest to our natures is the force which moves the world. Inheritence and circumstances combine to decide the course the ambition shall take, but in each one is a germ which often shows itself in early life a preference. One boy plays marbles and trades them off for tops and kites as the season changes; but his brother hunts bird's nest to collect eggs, brings home stray pets, and can tell wonderful stories of the habits of animals. One little girl has her dolls always sick, and doses and bandages and doctors them till they would surely lose their lives, if they had any to lose; while another designs and cuts and makes the most wonderful costumes for her miniature children. Talents are usually shown in preferences more or less strong, and upon their wise and patient cultivation depends the realization of our ideal. "To him that hath shall be given" is an inexorable law. The individual end to be accomplished will always vary, but the common end of success is fixed and universal. And what is the success for which we are all striving? What is this ever silent voice which urges us to more and more than we have yet accomplished. For, however much we have done, something remains beyond. Every true musician has felt the throb of higher harmonies than he has yet produced. Every fine architect has visions of structures that have never yet been built. Every righteous merchant sees better methods and nobler results for commerce than have yet been attained. Every earnest and upward-striving worker in any direction has felt the stirrings of grander possibilities in his sphere of action than he has yet achieved. This ever growing desire for something higher and better is the human, but heaven born, instinct which urges the development of all possibilities with us. However great or small they may be, this is our real work in life, this should be our main thought, this is the real and only success—to develop to the utmost those capabilities with which we were endowed. A young man enters the ministry for example, filled with enthusiasm for his calling responding sensitively to the responsibilities of his position, earnest in his desire to comfort to teach, to uplift, to bless struggling humanity. His success must be the constant following of that ideal, the daily living such a life of rectitude and labor and sympathy and true helpfulness as shall inspire and support all with whom he come in contact. It is not so much what he accomplishes in relation to people as what he accomplishes in relation to his own possibilities that determines his real success. And, though others may judge him by what he has done, he will judge himself by a truer, and it may be, a severer, standard—by what he might have done. And the same is true of every honest, earnest worker, in whatever sphere his life-work is cast. If in the pursuit of that on wich we have set our hearts, we take steps which violate our sense of right and lower our moral tone, to just that extent do we lessen the success of our lives. The temporary gain which may seem to ensue is, in reality, our worst failure, and will, in time, manifest itself as such. So completely does the success of a man's work depend upon the success of his life that it is worse than useless for him to attempt to secure the former at the expense of the latter. Each one has some talent, some preference. Let him work in that line, if possible; but while he cultivates himself in that, let him at the same time, keep such a hold on the other phases of life as shall round and make symmetrical his nature. Life is so complex that we are not making exclusively in one line. Our natures are rich and varied. Many sides must be brought out befor we can attain our fullest development. A narrow idea of success sufficies for most of us. The attainment of political power, of literary fame, of wealth, of comforts, even excellence in one direction, is only a part of a broader success which involves a continual exercise of those powers in which we excel, and a continual awakening of those which have lain dormant within us. This is the goal best worth striving for, though too often we see only the close-lying objects, and do not realize the breadth of the outlook from higher ground. But if we still struggle, however, blindly we shall, little by litle, attain more nearly the larger thoughts and broader desires which, making our individual success in life, tend also to make the grand success of the world.

Ex-Gov. Alger for the Cabinet.

National Tribune.

The veterans have centered their hopes of a representative in Gen. Harrison's Cabinet upon Ex-Gov. Russell A. Alger, of Michigan.

Comrade Alger's war record was brilliant. He enlisted a few days after the firing on Fort Sumpter, speedily became Captain of his company, and made his way up to a Brevet Major-Generalcy by hard fighting and effective service. He was twice severely wounded, once taken prisoner, but escaped, and was repeatedly complimented in reports for distinguished conduct on the field.

In civil pursuits he has achieved signal success. By his own unaided abilities; by energy, forethought and force of character he has become one of the foremost business men of the country, esteemed everywhere for fair dealing, largeness of comprehension, uprightness and responsibility. Not only would he be a strong man in council—bringing to the discussion of every question an unusual mental power, and a wide range of practical knowledge—but his character and standing would be a tower of strength to the incoming administration.

The veterans love and admire Gen. Alger for his splendid soldiership and magnificent business abilities, for his open-handed generosity to the poor and unfortunate, and for his thorough identification and sympathy with his comrades of the late war. He is their friend and representative in the same sense and to the same extent that his life-long friend Gen. Logan was. With him in the Cabinet, they will be sure of having a man there whose friendship they can confidently count on all the time; who thinks and feels as they do on all questions; who will be their advocate and spokesman, and who will lead them as ably and sucessfully as he once led them in battle.

They believe that, considering how much they did to bring Gen. Harrison into power, they should have such a representative in his Cabinet, and Gen. Alger is the man they would like to have represent them. The appointment would make glad the heart of a millio n veterans.

The Washburn Blast.

Caledonia Argus: Mr. Washburn—We mean the seventeen-millon-interest-and-discount, Washburn, who was recently railroaded into the senate—said in an interview in his organ, the Tribune, that Sabin's following was made up of "mercenary men, the political strumpets," and good Br'er Heatwole takes umbrage at it. A man who meets a charge of bribery by saying that it is only "satan rebuking sin," confessing that he bribed but the other did also; a man who prides himself so on his deftness as a bribe-giver that he can "defy the most searching investigation," yet whose supporters dare not even permit the evidence of his bribery to be given to the public but smother it in the senate, is hardly a man who can offer an insult to any decent self-respecting man.

Heron Lake News: It seems almost incredible that any man should so degrade himself as to make use of such insulting and wholly uncalled-for language. We have waited a number of days in the hope of seeing Mr. Washburn's denial of the reported interview, but as yet none has been made, and we cannot do less than to accept the article as the words of Minnesota's newly elected senator.

Slayton Grzette: Senator Washburn, in a recent interview stated that he "should have been prouder to have been defeated with the men who aided him," than to have been elected by the aid of men like Sabin's friends, or words to that effect. It is extremely ungentlemanly and unkind for a victorious candidate to use such language. For one, we would rather go down with a man like Senator Sabin than float on up with an icicle.

Peterson's Magazine for March is an admirable number. The steel-engraving, "A Venetian Flower Girl," is one of the finest we have seen in a long while, and is accompanied by an exceedingly dramatic story. "Washing Day" is a very effective and amusing wood-illustration. The opening article, "The Three Victorias," will prove particularly interesting at this time, when the young German Princess's much-talked-of marriage is again under discussion. The serial, "Nicholas Cleever's Money," ends in this number, and is one of its talented author's best efforts. The opening chapter of Mrs. Lovell Wilson's novelet, "A Modern Petruchio," give promise of a story of unusual brilliancy. A goodly array of capital short stories, hints on household economy, the latest fashion novelties, fully illustrated, and numerous pretty designs for the work table, make up a very handsome number of this popular lady's book. Terms: Two dollars per year, with reductions to clubs. Address Peterson's Magazine, 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Prizes to the amount of $5,000 are offered in the American Agriculturist for February for the largest yield of one measured acre each of corn, wheat, oats and potatoes. The first prize for each crop is $500 in gold. The complete premium list forms a prominent feature of this issue of the Agriculturist, and an article on maximum crops shows that it will not be so very difficult to capture these prizes. The experiment stations and state boards of agriculture are cooperating with the Agriculturist in making this competition the greatest event of the kind in the history of American farming.

A. A. White, in Moorhead News: I have known Mr. J. P. Williams, who has been appointed by Gov. Merriam a member of the board of railroad and warehouse commissioner, for a number of years. It is a good appointment. Mr. Williams is an able lawyer and a stirring business man of excellent character. He will undoubtedly make a very satisfactory member of the board.

The National Tribune
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Is one of the less than half-a-dozen really great family papers in the country.

IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Published at the National Capital.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Devoted to the history of the war.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
Devoted to the interests of ex-soldiers and sailors.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
That makes a bold and persistent fight f o their rights.
IT IS THE ONLY ONE
That continually insists on justice being done the country's defenders.
It Has More Distinguished Contributors than Any Other Paper.

A Splendid 8-Page, 56-Column Paper.

Printed on fine paper, edited with signal ability and filled with the most interesting matter that can be procured.

ONLY $1 A YEAR—TWO CENTS A WEEK.

The National Tribune is the result of years of earnest, thoughtful effort, accompanied by a heavy expenditure of money, to build up at the Capital of the country which should be a welcome weekly visitor at every fireside from the Atlantic to the Pacific and champion effectively the cause of loyalty and good government, and of justice to the soldiers and sailors of the late war, their widows, children and dependent relatives. How well this has been done is best indicated by the wonderful success of thepaper, which has attained popularity and circulation more rapidly than any other in the history of American journalism.

A GREAT FAMILY NEWSPAPER

Features of the Paper.

The National Tribune makes a special feature of the history and reminiscences of the war for the preservation of the Nation. It publishes in fact the

ONLY GENUINE HISTORY

of that gigantic struggle, for its history is not a warped and biased panegyric of some particular man or men, who are given credit for everything that succeeded. It is made up of the testimony of a multitude of witnesses, the plain, unvarnished stories of the men in every rank and degree who did the marching, digging and shooting and carried forward the war through all its various phases to a glorious success. The great value of the National Tribune's history is everywhere recognized, and its files are carefully preserved in every large library and historical collection in the country—North or South.

A fascinating story by Col. Thos. Knox, the brilliant writer of popular books, is now running in the paper.

An entertaining historical romance, by Frances Wilson (Fannie Williams), now appearing, is exciting great interest among the young folks with whom Miss Wilson has always been a great favorite.

John McElroy, who has written so much and so acceptably for the soldiers, will soon begin another war story.

Besides this it presents every week a splendid array of Editorials on Current Topics—Stories by the Best Authors—Wit, Humor and Information—Agricultural Notes of the Greatest Value—Household Hints and Suggestions—Synopsis of the News of the Week—Answers to Correspondents—Bright Miscellany, etc., which will interest, amuse and instruct every member of the family.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., FEBRUARY 14, 1889.

Two Cents a Mile.

Western Rural: There is a disposition in our legislatures to reduce railroad fares to two cents a mile, something that should have been done long ago. Railroads carry thousands of passengers at less than two cents a mile and make money at it. To permit them, under such circumstances, to keep the regular rate at three cents is a species of generosity on the part of legislators that can be accounted for only upon the supposition of unfathomable stupidity or something that is more financially profitable. It is an outrage to permit these corporations to fleece the treveling public year after year to the extent of one-third more than they might carry their passengers for and make a splendid profit. The roads can afford the reduction and the people demand it. What more do legislators require as a prompting to do their duty?

Does it Pay?

Motley Register.

This question should be asked by every one who contemplates entering any profession or following any line of work. It is important alike to the merchant and the mechanic, the politician and the planter. Each person should be a self-appointed investigating committee to overhaul his own (not his neighbor's) affairs and make them pass a rigid civil service examination. Many men do this and can give an affirmative answer. Farmers, as a rule, are less able than any other class to answer the question either one way or the other. And yet they, above all others, have need to know just what system is profitable and what is unprofitable, because of the supposed small margins even under the best management. The following expressions are so often repeated by so many different persons that they may be taken as cellulo-electrotpes of the most durable quantity: "Farming doesn't pay;" "Wheat raising doesn't pay, because the price is too low;" "Stock raising doesn't pay, because the winters are to long." Particular stress is often laid on this last quotation. But sometimes you meet a farmer who does know just what stock costs and the returns it gives. In conversation with A. J. Collins the other day he gave us the following information in regard to his Cass County dairy for the past eight months. He reckoned from May 1st to January 1st. Milked 10 cows. The following is a transcript of his books:

	Dr.
Value of 10 cows	$250 00
Hay for same, 12 tons @ $5	60 00
Shorts and other feed	40 00
Total	$350 00
	Cr.
Increase 9 calves @ $5	$ 45 00
Five hogs raised on milk	.25 00
Milk for ourselves @ 2c ℔ qt.	10 00
1308 lbs butter at market price	247 33
Total	$327 33

Thus lacking but $22.67 of paying for the 10 cows and their keeping in the short space of eight months. Mr. Collins also says, that his cows are in much better condition than when he began last May, and expects even better results the coming year. Here is food for thought for those farmers who "can't make farming pay."

Tennessee Holsteins.

Tennessee Farmer: Mr. J. L. Whitworth of Whitland Farm, near Nashville, has recently purchased thirty-two Holsteins, all females. Fourteen are tested cows. The lowest test is 41 lbs. of milk per day, and that a two-year-old with first calf. Five have records of over 60 lbs. of milk per day, and nine over 50 lbs. All less than 50 lbs. per day are three-year-olds with first calf. The butter range from 16 lbs. per week. All not tested are heifers or have just calved. These cows are by such sires as Rembrant, Netherland Prince, Prince Imperial, Prince of Wayne 2d, Sam Patch, Prince George, Oatka's Prince by Burly, Cassette's Champion by Prince of Maury, whose dam, Aaggie Clara, gave 84 lbs. of milk as a three-year-old. There are eight of these heifers by Oatka's Prince, his dam having a record of 22 lbs., 8¼ ozs. of butter in seven days. These added to the tested cows which he already has, makes the herd a valuable one. He has also a few Jersey alongside of these milking tests.

We are glad to hear of such pluck and energy. He knows what cattle are worth and what they are useful for. This is the largest deal we have heard of lately, and does not look much like our breeders have to go far to find a purchaser if they have the right thing to sell. A dairy cow capable of giving plenty of milk and butter and keep on doing it for a long time, with breeding good enough to impart these valuable qualities to the offspring, is worth much to our breeding interest and we hail such spirit as Mr. Wintworth has shown with pleasure. Should Holstein cattle become as highly prized in the south in the future as they are now in the north and northwest, then there will be several saying "I wish I had."

Established Evils.

Western Rural.

We are a great people for law and, as we have often remarked, for passing resolutions. We adopt a set of resolutions, and then feel pretty safe; and if we can get a law enacted in accordance with the spirit of the resolutions we feel perfectly safe. But law will not reach some of our evils, that are so firmly established that they can bid defiance to law. In different sections of the country there has been much recent denunciation of the Sunday newspaper. If the Sunday newspaper is an evil, there is just one way to but a stop to its publication and only one, and that is to educate the people not to read it. This indicates the remedy for those evils which law will not reach. It is education. It is the development of public sentiment against the evil. Without a sustaining public sentiment it is impossible to enforce law, but when the sentiment is developed, if it is extensive enough, there will be a largely decreased patronage of the evil complained of. We are not making as much of education in this country as we should and must. People must be trained into decency and usefulness and general good citizenship through education. This is a good question to discuss in farmer's meetings: How shall we improve our systems of education? The defects in our ordinary education are well known, but bad as they are, they are not fully realized. The movement in the direction of manual training is immensely more important then the average person thinks. We were asked a few weeks ago where a boy can learn a trade, and our answer was the penitentiary was about the only place. The trades unions have shut the doors against the boys, and in so doing have taken a long step toward making their paupers and criminals. Does the mechanic think that he is benefitted by aiding in the creation of crime and pauperism? It would seem so, and if he does so think he needs education. Trades unions, as at present managed, while productive of some good are productive of much evil; and yet it is evil which education alone can successfully reach. Men must be educated until they can comprehend the meaning of modren civilization, the nature of our system of government and especially that a narrow selfishness is not profitable. We cannot legislate the selfishness out of a man. We can educate it out, or rather we can turn it by education into a useful channel. Selfishness is not at all objectionable, if it is the proper kind of selfishness. When it can be taught that its most profitable gratification is in doing unto others as we would be done by, selfishness will lead the individual to a John Howard or a Florence Nightingale, and that would be a commendable selfishness.

There should be law enough to punish a dishonest selfishness. The men who steal railroads and telegraphs and rob the people ought to be sent to the penitentiary, as a means of restraining them and of educating others, but to think that we can over-crush the spirit of greed by law, is the greatest folly. We must educate. Lift human nature upon a higher plane. We must give men the power of greater self control; give them the ability to earn a living through practical education; and when we start on a course like that we shall seriously wound some very thriving established evils. The farmers, who are the majority of voters, can establish such system of education as they like, and hence they are not only interested in the matter, but a great responsibility rests upon them in connection with it.

Food or Breed.

Western Rural.

The flesh formers among food contain the principal elements that the cow requires. What will give her bone and muscle will furnish her the material out of which she can manufacture milk. One of the best breeders of Holstein-Friesians in the West feeds through the Winter almost wholly upon bran and straw and clames that he wants no better food to keep his cows fat enough and to keep up their milk yield. We have no doubt at all that in this great corn producing region we attach much more value to it than it deserves. It is cheap and plentiful and we have got into the rut of feeding it to everything and at all times, in a greater or less quantity and we certainly feed it frequently when something else would be better. Still we believe that it is valuable as a part of the ration for a milch cow. While we never tried it we should not care to adopt the bran and straw ration. Corn is rich in fat and must have some effect upon the quality of the milk, for the food imparts its character to the milk. It is sometimes said that the breed gives the quality. The breed has much to do with it. But an ordinary cow can be made to give milk in larger quantity and better quality by a judicious system of feeding; and improved breeds, as already intimated, are as dependent for their excellence upon good foods as upon good breeding. Hence what will produce the most and best milk, without injury to the cow, is the question always before us, taking into consideration all the circumstances under which we are placed.

MORTGAGE SALE.

[First publication Jan. 3d, 1889.]

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of two thousand three hundred ninety-three and 25-100 dollars, ($2,393.25-100) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Robert Houston and Evelyne M. Houston, his wife, to The Merchants' National Bank, of Crookston, bearing date the 23d day of March A. D. 1888, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 14th day of April A. D. 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m., in book "22" of mortgages, on page 231, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given, That by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Fifty (50) feet off the east side of lot twenty-three (23,) block two (2,) in Hurlbut's Addition to the townsite of Crookston, according to the plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, for Polk County, Minnesota, also lot five (5,) in section thirty-two (32,) township one hundred any fifty (150) north, range forty six (46) west, containing thirty-four and 50-100 acres according to the government survey thereof, in Polk County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said county and state, on the 23d day of February, A. D. 1889, at ten o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises and fifty dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated December 23d A. D. 1888.

A Significant Conundrum, and a Protest.

Farm, Stock and Home.

We clip the following from the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL. The writer voices a query which has been in the minds of multitudes of northwestern farmers scores of times during the past few months:

"Will some of our elevator men please rise up and explain why rejected wheat is worth only twenty-six cents per bushel? Last week I hauled a load of rejected wheat to the Terrebonne mill, and had it ground. I received twenty lbs. of flour and twelve and one-half lbs of bran and shorts per bushel. Estimating the flour at three cents, and the bran and shorts at one-half cent per lb., which is a very low estimate, I received sixty-six and one-fourth cents per bushel for my wheat, besides one-eighth for grinding, which makes the wheat worth seventy-five cents per bushel. I for one would like to know why the elevators can't pay at least fifty cents for the above grade of wheat?

M. E. BARTLETT."

Apropos to this, the Jamestown (North Dak.) Capitol reads the riot act to the millers of its region because of their extortionate prices for flour. From its vigorous protest we reproduce a sample utterances:

"The high price of flour in this territory in consequence of avaricious greed of the mill owners is a serious drawback to immigration. The marvelous production of wheat in this country and the exorbitant price of flour in the midst of it is an inconsistency that cannot be accounted for legitimately and therefore the eastern home-seeker who turns his investigation Dakota-ward is forced to the conclusion that either our reports of wheat production are fabulous or the flour made from it passes through the hands of men whose souls are made of avarice, either of which is damaging to the otherwise fair name and fame of Dakota. The man in ordinary circumstances cannot do without bread, and the country that puts extortion upon him in this portion of his living admonishes him to stay away from it. But the millers will hold up their hands in holy horror at the publication of these things because it would discourage immigration. The time has come when this country can stand upon its own merits and things should and must be called by their right names. The exorbitant price the people of this country are compelled to pay for flour is nothing more nor less than robbery through a plan which the law cannot reach, whether it is done by individual monopoly in a locality or combination under the "trust" system. It is useless for the territory to expend money on an immigration bureau while the millers are given avaricious license to counteract its efforts by extortion in the price of flour. In the din of noise made over railroad freights and elevator charges it might be well enough to stop long enough to think that the farmer can run his wheat through an elevator, ship it to competing mills in the east, pay elevator charges and freight on the wheat sent out and on the flour returned and have more net flour than he can get by drawing his wheat to the mills almost at his door."

Putting the foregoing editorial and letter together forces the conclusion that the art of making "wheat cheap and flour dear," as proclaimed by the late millers' convention in Milwaukee, is not monopolized by the big millers alone, but that the smaller fry has "caught on" in great shape, and proposes to discount the avarice and extortion of their more powerful instructors. If agriculture is not driven off the face of that portion of the earth occupied by the United States, it won't be for want of earnest persistent efforts of confederated capital to do it.

Minnesota State Agricultural Society.

PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
ST. PAUL, Minn. Jan. 15th 1889.

To the Producers of Minnesota:

Gentlemen:—Having been unanimously chosen by your representative delegates as President of the Minnesota State Agricultural Society, I shall accept such unanimous choice as voicing the sentiment of the producers of this state. Taking this view of the matter, it may not be out of place for me to expect, in the administration of the duties of my office, the cordial support of every citizen of this state who has an interest in its welfare and development. That this expectation may be realized, is my earnest wish.

The Minnesota State Agricultural Society has come to be one of the GREATEST FACTORS in the development of this great commonwealth, simply because her citizens in all parts of this state have, in the past, supported in every way the patriotic and able efforts of those who have managed its affairs. Certain it is, that without such co-operation, no such grand results could have been attained.

It is well understood by all, that for several years the time and attention of the president and board of managers of this society have been, in a large measure, directed towards completing in all respects the magnificent grounds provided for our annual fairs, supplying them with ample buildings and all modern appliances and improvements necessary in affording ample opportunity to the agriculturist in all branches to exhibit the products of the soil, the tree, and the vine in a highly satisfactory manner, while, at the same time, spacious buildings have been provided for the exhibit of every class of stock bred in the state; and the manufacturer has been given ample room and furnished sufficient motive power to enable him to exhibit all manufactured articles in a manner unexcelled in this country. This has been brought about only by the exercise of GREAT WISDOM AND PATRIOTISM, as well as by the sacrifice of much valuable time on their part.

All this being accomplished, the Minnesota State Agricultural Society has, in my opinion, arrived at a period in its history when it can by A TRUE SOURCE OF ENCOURAGEMENT TO OUR OWN PEOPLE, just in proportion as they rally to its upport, and by the exhibition of their products, prove to each other and to the world at large, that here in Minnesota we can produce in every variety, the very best quality of cereals, the most desirable, hardiest and finest breeds of stock in all the varied classes, and that our manufacturers are abreast with those of older states, who are active competitors for the sale of the various manufactured articles and mechanical contrivances, as well as vehicles used in this great western empire.

The State of Minnesota has within her boundaries ressources, if properly developed, amply sufficient to afford employment to all her inhabitants, and the question is brought home to us how can the Minnesota State Agricultural Society aid in this development?

I hold that this society is an institution founded by the people of this state to foster and encourage, in every part of the state, development in all the material industries, giving, first to our own citizens the recognition and reward which merit deserves, and at the same time, remembering producers of other states in our awards, in a just and liberal manner, in order that her exhibits may stimulate better production in our own state.

I believe that this society can accomplish much in this direction if every citizen will lend his influence in aid and support of the great annual fairs of this society, not only by their presence at such fairs as exhibitors and interested spectators but by timely words frequently spoken to all comers, as to the great knowledge of our states resources to be derived from a careful inspection of the wonderful variety of exhibits in the many departments constituting our fair. Then too, great good can be accomplished if all our citizens will pay careful attention to the management of the affairs of this society and, by their suggestions, counsel and advice (which are earnestly solicited,) aid your officers in making your annual fairs just what they ever should be, namely: your representative display.

To this end, you are requested to send your address to H. R. Denny, Hamline, Minn., secretary of this society, who will take pleasure in mailing to you, free of charge, our premium list for 1888, from which you can derive a general idea of what was accomplished at last year's fair. It is earnestly desired that you carefully examine this premium list and note any change in same that, in your opinion, would make this society more useful in its mission of encouraging production; that you make a written statement of such desired changes, together with your reasons for same, forwarding same promptly to us, and I assure you it shall have careful attention and consideration, and will be of great service in enabling us to arrive at the wishes of all our people, making our society more popular; consequently, more useful in its work, for I am quite sure that just so soon as we can meet the general desire as to what we shall have at our fairs and how we shall have it, just that moment will we enter upon a season of great prosperity for our state, our society and our individual producer, as well.

This conclusion is based upon the fact as proven by the exhibits of our products at expositions in various parts of the world, where they have invariably carried off great honors in every department. Such elements as these have made other countries famous and wealthy, and now that our society own grounds, wide in extent, buildings commodious, with all improvements necessary, why shall not the people of this state rise up as one man and, putting on their armor, fight nobly for recognition the world over, through the medium of the Minnesota State Agricultural Society? Will you do it? Time alone can tell; but I am firm in the belief that you will, and that the great state fair of this society for 1889 will be such a one as you will ever point to with pride and satisfaction.

In taking up the work of president of this society, so ably carried forward by my predecessor, I do so with a profound sense of the honor and responsibility of my position. It shall be my aim to promote to the best of my ability the great interests it was established to foster, striving by careful economy and a conscientious regard for the right of all good citizens from every part of this state to merit the approval and cordial support of all.

I shall put into the administration of my duties, whatever of ability, energy and experience I possess, guided and assisted by a board of managers composed of the best men in our state; but all this can avail nothing unless you join hands with me and strive earnestly for our state's prosperity. Will you do it?

Yours truly,
WM. M. BUSHNELL,
Pres. Minnesota State Agricultural Society.

Is it Prudent to Sow Frosted Wheat?

EDITOR FARM, STOCK AND HOME:

The enormous destruction of the spring wheat in the Northwest last August, involving heavy losses to the majority and a shortage of more than half the wheat yield of the year makes this a very important question. The experimental stations have undertaken to test the vitality of all samples of frosted seed sent them, and this will be so far useful. But the seed that will germinate 30 to 60 per cent. in a hotbed or even in a flower pot at home in a warm room may vegetate there without being at all suitable for use in the open field. The greatest advantage that we can have from such tests is that after having made a test under cover for vitality, those tests may be repeated in the open field next summer as a check on the indoor experiments. Whatever may be learned in that way, we want some assurance beforehand of the chances of another crop, and for the next two months will be plied with such queries as the above.

Some editors have already given their verdict. They reason from common experience and say: Does not every practical man know that the highest quality of grain has always proved most profitable as seed? Nobody can deny the soundness of this contention, and nobody can deny that frost does more or less injury to the vitality of seed grain. The logical deduction is that we ought not to use such seed if we can at all avoid it. But there are lots of people who practically cannot avoid it. They are too poor to buy any other sort, and what are these men to do? I know what many men in just the same fix have already done, and am quite familiar with their experience. I say that scores of men have sown wheat worth 15 or 25 cents as feed from which capital yields of good grading wheat has come. In the early days of Ontario when the great extent of timber made summer frosts very frequent, poor farmers sowed their frosted wheat, and if the next season was all right the crop came all right too. The Mennonites of Southern Manitoba came from a district of Russia where summer frosts were well known, and in 1885 they sold their own perfect grain at the elevators and bought seed from their less fortunate neighbors, in some cases enough to last them two seasons, and always with satisfactory results.

But because the men I have referred to sowed such seed and came out all right, it is not safe to infer that the same thing can be done everywhere and with all sorts of frosted seed. The reason for the success that has followed sowing frosted grain in the new Northwest seems to lie in this: The frosted kernel at best contains a smaller amount of food for the embryo plant than is found in a perfect kernel. It may be so defective that the germ itself is seriously injured or its vitality destroyed. But there are generally many well matured grains even in frosted samples, and others that look bad will in a genial climate strike out and grow enough to produce a healthy plant. It may not, and seldom can throw out stools as a stronger seed would do, but it will say throw up three stools where No. hard grain would throw up ten or even twenty, and those few stalks will grow straight up, while the other plant is spreading itself. The soil is new and full of readily available plant food, and the weak plant, should the weather be very fine for a week or two, will go on to live and thrive even though the germinal stock of food is poor. If the season proves highly favorable the best class of seed will run very much to straw and produce a very unthrifty crop of wheat. And if on the other hand your frosted seed, after it has got a start should receive a check from ten days of cold, backward weather, then it will most likely do rather poorly.

The fact that thousands of bushels of good wheat have been raised in the Red River Valley, in more than one season of the last seven, can be abundantly proved. My attempted explanation of this fact may be controverted, but the facts are there all the same. Any man can put the thing to the test for himself this very season. If on test, either at home or by an experimental farm test, you have found that say 50 per cent. of your wheat will germinate, you may sow a bushel of best seed against two of frosted to the extent of ten or twenty acres of each, on the same sort of land that has been treated the same way. In the hard wheat country, with an ordinarily favorable season, you are sure to have a fair crop either way. That is the teaching of experience. If you try the same thing anywhere else than in the stimulating atmosphere and virgin soil of the Red River country, you are pretty certain to get left. I could produce, if necessary, dozens of cases which entirely confirm my view that what doesn't suit in old countries will do very well here.

Education for Farmer's Boys.

Northwestern Agriculturist.

The necessity for economy in expenditures comes at an unfortunate time for Minnesota. The advance made in wealth and population imposes expenses on this young State, which have been spread over many years in older commonwealths. Take for instance, the State University. From a comparatively obscure institution it has lately stepped into the front rank, and only needs liberal appropriations to make it the equal of the best universities in the country. The law and Medical departments, added recently, have proven popular beyond all anticipation and to meet actual necessities large expenditure is required. The practical School of Agriculture is another child of the University that has already developed into quite a vigorous youngster, justly demanding attention. There are very few people, who have followed the development of the University closely enough to realize its present commanding position or its future posibilities. The importance to the State a University of high rank need not be argued. It means progress at home and respect abroad. It will be a public misfortune if the want of funds compels the state to "go slow" in building on the broad foundations already laid.

Not the least important of the department of the University is the School of Agriculture at the Experiment Farm. Its plan is new, and the result is being watched not only by the educators of Minnesota, but by those of the whole country. It is likely that this school will be a model for other states, and that it will solve the problem that has puzzled teachers and legislators alike, how to educate farmer's boys, so as to develope a love for the farm instead of alienating them from it. The success of this school, and the enthusiasm of the boys who have availed themselves of its opportunities, are the best evidences that its plan is correct, and its training such as will make farmers, instead of doctors, lawers and middle men. The endorsement of the boys and their friends who have studied the methods of the institution outweighs all the resolutions of those who condemn without investigation.

The objection sometime urged that the location of this school exposes boys to the temptations of the cities is not a valid one. It is too late in the age to hope to shut boys out from knowledge of city life. It is too late in the century to make boys temperate and virtuous by keeping them ignorant and innocent. Innocence is weak before temptation, and ignorance is easiest victim to vice. Temperance and virtue come with knowledge and self restraint. No boy who is worth raising will grow to manhood without seeing something of the life in cities, nor is it desirable that he should. The question is How he shall see it? Under the guidance of those who will show things as they are, stripping off the gilding, or in the hap-hazard way that most boys get experience? The school is as isolated as any farm, and yet the cities are accessible, and it is a part of the plan of the school to teach boys how to behave in the city, and to warn them of the dangers which shipwreck so many men. It is a singlar fact that boys, coming to the city while young, and compelled to be industrious, very rarely go to the bad. It is from this class that the best and most successful business men are recruited. But young men brought up in the country, who leave the farm on attaining their majority to "see life," with idle time on their hands are caught as moths are caught by a candle. The School of Agriculture gives all favorable conditions for boys to learn what they should know of cities without harm. They learn the cities slowly and in easy lessons and not one in a thousand will find less attractions on the farm for what he sees of city life. No boy will take harm under such circumstances unless naturally vicious. Idleness wrecks boys in the city; those who have somthing to do, seldom acquire bad habits.

Aside from the moral or immoral influences of the cities, there are other advantages connected with the present location which should not be ignored, and which no isolated position in the country could command. The boys attend school to study and not work. They are to be taught the theory at school. Practice and the application of the theory is accomplished with the least expense at home and on the farm. When located near the city, facilities for teaching are at hand. Take for instance, the lessons given by the Veterinary Professor. In the cities it is possible to illustrate these by actual practice, and thus to clinch the knowledge imparted. The same is true of many other branches of knowledge which should be taught.

The farmer of the future is not likely to be damaged by too much education. Those who are successful must use their brains as well as their hands, and training of the mind is as important as training of the hands. As competition grows sharper, success will depend more and more on knowledge and training. The farmer of the future will be expected to take a hand in public affairs, and when called to the front to take a responsible position, he will need a knowledge of men and affairs which he cannot get on the farm alone. The experience which he gets at school will help him amazingly, when he takes his place as a practical legislator. An ignoramus can find fault and grumble, but it takes both wisdom and ability to reconstruct and build better.

"Trusts."

Farm, Stock and Home.

Judge Cooley, one of the few prominent men of the nation who seem to realize that there are any common people in it, and chairman of the inter-state railroad commission, says of trusts:

"The difference between a trust and a pool is almost as great as that between a despot on the throne and the player who mimics him on the stage. They are things to be feared. They antagonize a leading and most valuable principle of industrial life in their attempt, not to curb competition merely, but to put an end to it. The course of the leading trust of the country has been such as to emphasize the fear of them, and the benefits that have come from its cheapening of an article of commerce are insignificant when compared with the mischiefs that have followed the exhibitions in many forms of the merciless power of concentrated capital. And when we witness the utter heartless manner in which trusts sometimes have closed manufactories and turned men willing to be industrious into the streets in order that they may increase profits already reasonably large, we cannot help asking ourselves the question whether the trust as we see it is not a public enemy; whether it is not teaching the laborer dangerous lessons; whether it is not helping to breed anarchy?"

Holstein-Friesians.

Colman's Rural World.

The Holstein-Friesians have been before the American public long enough, and there has been enough said in their behalf to familiarize everyone interested with what they have been bred for, what they are able to do, and hence what may generally, with proper care and attention, be expected of them. Their history in the country of their origin traces away back; how far we are almost afraid to say for fear that those unfamiliar with the facts might be tempted to believe us special pleaders. The fact remains, however, that be that time two thousand years on only two hundred they have been raised, bred and handled for special qualities long enough to thoroughly establish them and to make certain the transference therof from parent to offspring. The claim is that their history may be traced for two thousand years and that for centuries the black and white Dutch cattle have afforded their owners more and better family supplies than the cattle of other countries were known to do, and that their value as large, vigorous and hardy milch stock has made them famous the world over.

THEIR RECORD

in this country is such as to surpass belief to those unacquainted with the facts. If the average farmer will measure or weigh the milk produce of his cows for a week on ordinary feed with a view to discovering what they can do, and will compare the results, he will learn something that will last him a lifetime. Let us see. From the mass of figures there given we quote: Echo's two year's record of 1883, 18,102 lbs., and 1884, 23,775½ lbs. Clothilde's record, 2g,021¼ lbs. Pietertje's record of 30,318¼ lbs. of milk in 365 days. To the ordinary mind these figures are beyond comprehension. If one of these cows should weigh 1,200 lbs. when the tests were made it will be seen that in the first year of her test Echo gave one and a half times her own weight of milk every month, and in the second within a fraction of double her own weight every month of the year, whilst the record of Pietertje shows two and one-half times her own weight every month if that weight was 1,200 lbs., a good big cow. It is not said here that all Holstein cows will do this, it is not said that the average will do one-half this any more than that every Shorthorn cow will, at four years old, weigh 2,000 lbs. because one has done so here and there. Our point is to indicate what has been done with good Holstein cattle and to show the ordinary farmer that, by their employment, he may do much better than with the common run of good cows. The above refers to their milk records, but as it has been claimed that their milk is lacking in butter making qualities a few more figures must be given.

THEIR BUTTER RECORDS.

Mercedes won the Challenge Cup offered for the largest butter record in thirty days in 1883. This was open to the world and to all breeds and was won by a Holstein over and from the best Jerseys in the world. Her record was 99 lbs. 6¾ ozs. At the New York dairy show of 1887, gotten up for the purpose of testing the best animals to be produced of any breeds, the championship was won by Clothilde and the second prize by the three-year-old heifer, Clothilde 4th. In one herd a test of forty cows was made; twenty-nine gave an average production of 17 lbs. 7½ ozs. Aggie 2d made 26 lbs. 7 ozs. in the same length of time and 105 lbs. 10½ ozs. in thirty days. Many similar tests might be given but these will suffice or the page mentioned be referred to for more.

During the last thirteen years, says Farm, Stock and Home, 423 railroad companies, with 43,770 miles of lines, representing securities of about $2,545,000,000, have been seized by the courts for the benefit of creditors and sold at auction. In almost every instance these seizures have been the result of premeditated wrecking of the roads for the purpose of freezing out and robbing original stockholders. Many railroad kings are now able to count their millions by reason of such practices, and they are now piteously begging to be "let alone" by legislatures, courts and the people generally.

Farm, Stock and Home: The Michigan legislature is considering a law to reduce the maximum passenger rate to two cents a mile. The railroads say if this is made the legal rate they will issue no passes, make no special or excursion rates, and charge everybody, high and low, the lawful rate. "Consummation devoutly to be wished." Quite too long have railroads made the poor man pay the fare of the rich one. It is time railroad discrimination against the pauper and in favor of the prince came to an end. It it the duty of every state legislature to fix maximum passenger rates so low that special favors to those who are abundantly able to pay their way will be impossible.

Cotton-Seed Meal.

American Agriculturist: There is no more concentrated food for cows or fattening cattle (pigs are not included) than the meal of the cotton-seed oil cake. It is too rich for careless use and should be fed with great caution. It contains nearly fifty per cent. of nitrogenous matters and is consequently fully six times as nutritious in this respect as lean meat, as the latter contains about seventy-five per cent of water. This highly nitrogenous character makes cotton-seed meal exceedingly stimulating, and as the excess of the nitrogen elements that are not digested must pass off by the kidneys, these delicate organs are easily overworked and the blood rendered impure by the absorption of urea. Hence, this meal should not be given in larger rations than two pounds daily, and never to cows that are approaching the termination of their pregnancy. Abortion may be caused, or if this is escaped milk fever will be imminent. Young cattle, especially yearlings, may have a few ounces of it daily with benefit. At the usual price of twenty-five dollars per ton it is the cheapest of all foods, but its cheapness, estimated by its concentrated nutritive character, should not tempt one to use too much of it. Cows will be very apt to be troubled with garget if fed at all too liberally with it. For pigs it is altogether to stimulating, and should not be used.

CROOKSTON MINN., FEBRUARY 21, 1889.

'Round Home.

Wheat 1 Hard $1.01.

John Watts left for the coast this week.

Who said we wasn't going to have snow enough?

Miss Birdie Wright has been sick with pleuresy.

Look out for the grand opening of Anderson & Co.

Saturday's train from the south was three hours late.

Elt Sargent made a flying trip to St. Hilaire yesterday.

Look out for the great and only John Dillon, Friday evening.

There will be baptism in the Baptist church next Sunday evening.

The various projects for county division are hung up for the session.

Mrs. J. O. Milne has organized a class in vocal music, in the 5th ward.

The Ladies' Aid, of the Baptist church, met with Mrs, Will Lytle last week.

John Dillon takes a hand at base ball to-morrow evening at the opera house.

Miss Minnie Crookshanks has accepted a position as teacher at Maple Bay.

Dr. Just gave a pleasant whist party at his office, Thursday evening of last week.

Lovers of base-ball should see John Dillon play a game at the opera house Friday evening.

A. J. AnDyke is entertaining his brother, F. AnDyke, from the southern part of the state.

Rev. Harrison, who has been aiding in the meetings in the M. E. church, left on Monday.

Prof. Moore entertained his philosophy class, Tuesday evening, after school, with a number of experiments.

Conductor Copeland was pedagogue n the central school one day last week, during Miss Campbell's absence.

A local company gave an impromptu concert at the residence of Mr. Darco, last week. A good time is reported.

Mr. Hinckley, of Lake City, was in the city, Monday, looking about for a suitable place for a business settlement.

L. Benoit returned on Saturday morning from a five weeks visit to the twin cities. Says business is duller there than here.

Geo. Knowlton, a commercial traveler, of St. Paul, and 1st Lieut., this Division, Sons of Veterans, was in the city this week.

D. Jacobus has gone on a business visit to the twin cities and Chicago. He will drop in and see how laws are made while in St. Paul.

"When I holler, its law!" John Dillon will "holler" at the opera house on Friday evening in his new play, "A Sky Scraper."

Gallasch will be up in a few days and then it will be in order for him to explain about that masquerade ball. Geo. McManus and Harry Ives don't give it away worth a cent.

A. Chabot returned from the saintly city on Wednesday morning. Says he is glad to get back to a warm climate as it is fearfully cold down there. We know what ails Chabot but we ain't going to give it away—not just yet awhile.

Jimmie O'Brien says of all the freaks of nature he ever saw was the fellow who came into his hardware store the other day to sell him a stock of cigars. And the funniest part of it was the hard work he had to convince him that hardware stores ain't built that way.

W. N. Godfrey was in from Maple Bay this week. W. N. reports everybody enjoying themselves cutting wood and looking for an early break-up. W. N. is getting out several hundred cords of wood for the market and is now ready for orders by the cord or carload.

The members of the Congregationa church will give a social this eveningl at the residence of A. A. Miller, and the friends of Rev. W. H. Medlar are invited to attend, as this will likely be his last opportunity to be present on such an occasion in this city, as he will leave in a few days.

E. O. Flanders and S. M. McKee intend to have an auction sale before April 1st the exact date of which they cannot name until they ascertain when their horses will arrive. They expect to receive several carloads of horses as soon as the weather will permit when they will announce their date.

John Bain, a member of the house of representatives was up from St. Paul a few days ago to see his father, deacon R. Bain, of Fisher. During his few days visit here he became so thoroughly impressed with the needs of this country that he is now ready to do all he can for the drainage bill, the D. & W. road and every other project that will benefit this country.

E. D. Childs came up on Monday to get acquainted with his family. His connection with the D. & W. road gives him business requiring his absence from home most of the time. He recently returned from a two weeks trip to Washington, New York and Boston, and last Saturday he was attending a director's meeting in Chicago. He is doing some good hard work for the road and deserves success.

See Dillon as "Dennis O'Dowd" at the opera house to-morrow evening.

P. J. McGuire went to St. Paul this week to enjoy an outing and see how laws are made.

E. M. Walsh left for St. Paul on Monday evening for the purpose of introducing the bonding bill.

R. J. Montague was down to St. Paul last week looking after railroad matters in the interest of the new line.

Hugh Thompson is very much out of health this winter. Talks of going to the Hot Springs for a few week's recreation.

Jas. Novotny was down from Angus ast week enjoying life with friends in the city. Says much wheat will be sown in northern Polk this year.

Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, W. F. Zwickey, spent the Sabbath with his family in the city. Zwick has the reputation of being one of the best officials of the Senate.

The "white hats" captured the city but did not stay out very long, finding rather cold comport in promenading the streets. The music they did favor us with was highly appreciated.

Duncan Bain was up from Fisher this week. Elsewhere he advertises a choice lot of No. 1 Hard wheat for sale for seed. Warranted pure and free from foul seeds. If you want seed wheat, try Dunc.

Fred Anderson & Co. take possession of their new quarters in McKinnon block this week. They will open out in grand style, and intend to do a rushing business. The boys are A 1 hustlers and deserve big success.

The Opera House management has made one great improvement by the arrangement of the stoves. It is now possible to sit anywhere in the house without a fur coat on. Couverette looks well to the comfort of his guests and will be rewarded by full houses.

Gov. Merriam's action in commuting the sentence of Martin Moe to imprisonment for life meets with approval by all who know anything about the circumstances. The facts as developed show that Moe was not guilty as charged, and are sufficient grounds for a new trial which will no doubt be granted ater.

John Hunter was down from Maple Lake last week renewing old acquaintance. John has just received his patent on an improved switch by which the danger of open switches will be avoided, the engineer being enabled to open or close them at will. With such an arrangement Jack Streeter's death could have been avoided.

Ah, there, Uncle John! Ain't it about time for you to get well and resume your post as clerk of the weather? It is getting time for you to dish up some spring weather instead of this back-number, ice-palace foolishness that your substitute is giving us We object to your running the weather by proxy any longer.

The office of the Star and Times, of Hudson, Wis., was entirely destroyed by fire on Saturday morning, Feb. 10th. The paper appeared again on Friday, the 15th, with a full account of its own cremation, apparently as blithe and chipper as though it was not all burned up. The S. & T. is altogether too good a paper to be wiped out in that way.

If you intend to procure seed wheat under the new law you have little enough time to attend to it. The first of March is the limit. It is said that no human law is perfect, but it strikes us that this one could have been bettered by an earlier passage, thus giving full time for its perfect operation. We apprehend a great deal of dissatisfaction will arise under the conditions.

The seed grain bill received the Governor's signature last week and has become a law. It was slightly amended to exclude Wilkin County, (and then goes on and gives every county in the state a chance to come in under its provisions) and to include hail sufferers, and cuts out the clause giving the auditor two per cent.; also that providing for extra compensation for county commissioners.

Commissioner Rhinehart went to St. Paul last week. While there he did what he could to aid the Grand Forkers to secure an appropriation to aid in the construction of the two bridges across the Red River. It strikes us that a majority of the people of Polk County would not endorse his action in this matter. We have needs enough of our own without expending money to build up Dakota cities.

H. E. Ives finds time from his arduous duties as a committee clerk, to take daily exercise in the country in quest of June roses, of which he is passionately fond. Nothing pleases him better than a beautiful red rose (that cost a nickel) unless it be the operation (by fair hands) of pinning it to his coat lappel. Ives is fast becoming the Chesterfield of the Senate—dividing that honor with Ole Cutterson.

The Goodyear, Cook & Dillon Minstrel show, at the Opera House, on Saturday night, lacked many of the objectionable features of the average show and was, as is claimed for it, a refined entertainment in every particular. A few old chestnuts crept in as is unavoidable, where so many jokes are cracked. Many new and entertaining features were introduced, the most notable being a club swinging act, which is hard to beat. The house was well filled and all seemed to enjoy it hugely.

Suicide or Toothache?

A certain young man in our city, much given to getting off jokes on the other fellow with his little Faber, rather found the tables turned upon himself last week. In his quest for "locals" last week he kept his ears and mouth open so numerously that a huge cold took possession of a hollow molar causing him pain by the acre, or such a matter. To quiet the pain he resorted to laudanum, but being of a prohibitive turn of mind, he got an overdose, from the effects of which he has been obliged to keep in-doors for a week. He got out in time to caution us not to give it away, in this issue, promising, if we would not, to let the dentist interview the next toothache that comes his way.

A Peculiar Accident.

On Wednesday night, Feb. 13th, as the south bound train was slowing up, when about three car-lengths of the tank, one of the forward wheels of the engine broke, dropping the truck to the track. It took the boys just 30 minutes to clear the wreck, attach another engine and get ready to leave for St. Paul. Had the break occurred on the road between stations we might have had a more serious accident to record.

The democratic administration is getting generous in its dying moments. When Sparks was appointed it was very hard for an actual settler to prove up. At the present time, in this district, it seems to be very easy. A short time ago a claim in this township was proved up where there is not an acre under cultivation and no barn or well on the place.

The following petition, signed by all of the members of the district has been presented to the Board of Trustees of District No. 53:

Council Proceedings.

A regular meeting of the city council of the city of Crookston was held February 2d, 1889, the following members being present: Ald. Lally, Walter, Steenerson, Jerome, Marlette, Buhn, Nolan and Jennings. President Watts in the chair.

The minutes of last meeting were read and approved.

The committee appointed to report on how much water was used for the stock yards in 1887 and 1888, made their report, which was accepted.

Justice Lewis presented his quarterly report, which was accepted.

The committee appointed to revise the city ordinances reported progress and asked for further time, which was granted.

The proposed fire ordinance was referred to the fire committee to report on same at next regular meeting.

The following resolution, introduced by Ald. Lally, was unanimously adopted:

Whereas, A bill has been introduced in the legislature of the State of Minnesota to enforce forfeiture of the grant of swamp lands made by this state to the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad to aid in the construction of its line, and the passage of such bill will delay and endanger the building of said railroad and retard and permanently injure the northern portion of this state.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this City Council that the early completion of said road would be of great benefit in particular to the Red River Valley, in this State.

Resolved, further, That it is the sense of this Council that the passage of said forfeiture bill would prove a great public misfortune, and that it would be an unjust discrimination against the northern part of this state, through which said road is intended to be built.

Resolved, further, That the city clerk cause a copy of these resolutions to be presented to the legislature of this state and send a copy to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives from this district, and we earnestly request our representatives in the legislature to do all in their power to prevent said forfeiture bill becoming a law, and to work for such affirmative legislation as will secure the building of said Duluth & Winnipeg railroad at the earliest practicable date.

The bill of Joseph Netzer was referred to the building committee to report on same at next regular meeting.

The bill of the Crookston W. P. & L. Co., amounting to $499.86, being for rent of water service and for electric lights for January, 1889, was allowed, the same becoming due July 1st, 1889.

The following resolution, offered by Ald. Steenerson, was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That an order be drawn on the City Treasurer for the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars upon the special fund in his hands for the benefit and maintenance of the fire department to be by him devoted to paying rent for the department for the current year.

M. R. Brown gave notice that at the next meeting he would present a petition requesting that all sewer taxes be remitted and refunded where paid.

The following bills were allowed and ordered paid:

Rosenthal & Wile, mdse	$5 00
E. W. Wile, mdse	19 75
A. C. Schmidt, painting	7 05

The North Star Construction Company Files Articles of Incorporatin.

Lake Superior News: Articles of incorporation have been filed with the secretary of state by the North Star Construction Company, whose headquarters are to be at St. Paul. The capital stock is placed at $1,000,000 and the indebtedness is limited at $250,000. The incorporators are: T. B. Casey, Minneapolis; W. A. Barr, W. H. Fisher and W. P. Warner, St. Paul; Donald Grant, Faribault. The first board of directors will consist of A. W. Wright, W. H. Fisher, H. J. Boardman, R. S. Munger, T. B. Casey, John P. Knowles, C. W. Wells, Abner Smith and Geo. R. Baker. This is a company which was formed for the pushing of the work on the Duluth & Winnipeg. Its incorporators are practically the same men who are the moving spirits in the Duluth & Winnipeg road and they control ample capital to build it. The surveyors have just completed the survey as far as Grand Rapids on the Mississippi, and, unless legislative action hinders, there is every reason to believe that the work of grading and tracklaying will be pushed in the spring.

THOSE BONDS.

That our citizens may see just what the bill for bonding the city does provide we publish it in full as follows:

AN ACT.

Authorizing the City of Crookston, Polk County, to issue bonds to aid in the construction of any railroad or railroads which may hereafter run into said city.

The city of Crookston is hereby authorized and empowered as herein provided to issue bonds to an amount or amounts not to exceed in the aggregate to fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) to aid any railroad corporation or corporations, which may hereafter build a railroad or railroads into said city, in the construction of the same.

SEC. 2. Said bonds shall be issued in sums not less than one hundred dollars each, and may bear interest at a rate not to exceed five per cent per annum, payable annually, and shall run for a term not exceeding thirty years, from the date of the issuance thereof.

SEC. 3. The proposition to issue said bonds shall be submitted to the qualified voters of the city of Crookston at any regular or special election called for that purpose by the city council upon a petition signed by one hundred resident free-holders of said city being presented to them, stating the amount of bonds to be issued, and the names or designations of the railroad or railroads proposed to be aided thereby, and requesting that a meeting of the electors of said city be called for the purpose of voting upon the question of issuing such bonds. The notice of said election shall be given as provided by law, at which election those who vote in favor of the issuing of bonds shall have written or printed, or partly written and partly printed on their ballots the words "For the issuing of bonds for railroad purposes, yes," and those voting against the issuing of the bonds shall have written or printed, or partly written and partly printed on their ballots "For the issuing of bonds for railroad purposes, no," the vote of which shall be returned and canvassed in the same manner as the votes for city officers, and if it appears from such canvass that a majority of the voters present and voting at such election have voted in favor of the issuance of such bonds then the city council of said city shall cause to be issued said bonds, which bonds shall be signed by the mayor and city clerk and countersigned by the comptroller and the principal and interest as they become due shall be payable to the person or corporation to whom they shall be issued, or bearer.

Provided, That if the proposition to issue bonds is defeated, the city council shall not call another election to vote upon the same proposition until the expiration of one year after such proposition has been defeated.

Provided further, That no bonds shall be issued under this act which are not earned prior to January 1st, 1891.

SEC. 4. If any railroad corporation to which aid is voted under the provisions of this act shall thereafter file with the city clerk of said city, notice that it relinquishes and surrenders all rights acquired by it, under this act, then such aid may be voted to any other railroad corporation in the manner hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 5. For the purpose of paying the principal and interest of said bonds, said city council is hereby authorized and required to levy the necessary tax to pay the same as they shall become due.

SEC. 6. No bonds voted under the provisions of this act shall be issued or delivered until the railroad or railroads to which the same are voted shall be built and ready for operation into this city, if issued or delivered before such railroad or railroads shall be built and ready for operation into said city, then such bonds shall be null and void.

SEC. 7. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

THE WARDERS STORY

In an old worm eaten chest, the property of a lodger named William Willston, who died in a London tenement, was found the MS. ot the tale which follows:

I, William Worthington, believing that I am about to die, pray to heaven for strength to tell a tale of wrong and suffering. I know not the year in which I am living. I dare not ask. I only pray for strength to finish, for my wife and children, if they still live, the story of my woes. The shock of freedom upon my broken constitution is proving too great, and I feel that death is near. I was a warder in the Tower of London.

Every prisoner placed under my surveillance for twenty years had been tried, judged and sentenced by my inner consciousness, and as my intuitions led me, so were they treated though I never violated a law.

By this inner tribunal of my own, I judged that the Duke of Elton had been a traitor to his king, and from my hands he received no favors beyond the requirements of the law.

I little dreamed that so great a personage would wreak vengeance upon a vessal so far below him, yet his hirelings gave oath, months after his release, that during a time when the utmost watchfulness had been enjoined upon, the warders, I was found asleep at my post. During that critical period the penalty was death.

That very day I had walked far into the suburbs of London, on leave of absence to visit my family, and had returned to take my usual watch from nine at night until nine on the following morning.

I was weary and travel stained, which told against me, but as there is a just God in heaven, I did not sleep on my post, neither that night nor any night during my years of service. A warder had once slept and allowed the escape of political prisoners. He was accused of complicity, and the death penalty had been instituted.

I could prove nothing. I had paced the corridors through the night, but the prisoners had slept and could say nothing to save me.

Two men claimed to have passed through the corridor as the clock struck twelve, and upon their oaths affirmed that I was sleeping. If they entered the corridor at all, it was while I was at the farther end, and they must have left before my return. In vain I protested my innocence. The friends of the Duke of Elton were in favor, and my doom seemed inevitable.

I had been foully dealt with, and during a short recess I bethought me of foul means for escape.

I had a stanch friend in the tower, a fellow warden. I would risk everything and trust to him. The infinite patience and kindness of a mother's love had taught me to write, and I carelessly toyed with the materials at hand, stealthily writing a word or two now and then, without detection. At last it was finished, no whit too soon, for the opportunity came at once to slip into the warder's hand unseen, this writing:

Haste to the clock, outside the wall. Cut with a saw, a thirteenth notch, after the twelve, in the striking wheel, and save the life of
WILLIAM WORTHIGTON.

With this paper crumbled in his hand, he gave his evidence which availed me naught, save to prove that I was at my post before 11 o'clock, and the greetings were exchanged.

As he passed out he gave me a searching look, but its meaning I could not devine. I could not tell his bearing toward me. If I were removed my place would become his, and I was a little above him. Would he risk imprisonment for himself to save me?

Midnight alone could answer.

I was asked if I had aught to say, and, as though under the influence of a sudden recollection, I said:

"These men claim that the clock struck twelve while I was sleeping. At twelve o'clock I was awake, in proof of which know this: The great clock needs repairing, for at twelve in the night I counted thirteen strokes of the bell. It will probably do so again to-night. Wait and see."

Oh, the horror of those long hours of waiting! Three! Four! Five! Six o'clock, and for the first time in twenty years, save for my holidays, I was not in my place. Seven! Eight! Nine! And still the hours dragged on, wearily, when I bethought me of the all absorbing issue, but much too swiftly if that wooden wheel was untouched.

Ten and eleven o'clock struck. Then came the longest hour of my life. Days and weeks seemed to pass, and all the actions of my life trooped before me. I longed for midnight, and yet dreaded to know what fate it held in store for me.

"Boom!"—came the first stroke from the great bell. With breathless lips I counted the strokes, at each one pressing a finger into the palm of my hands so hard that the nails pierced the skin. Four fingers had thus closed on the right hand, and over them the thumb, recording the fifth stroke. Four more on the left hand and slowly over them closed the thumb, like a band of steel. Eleven! The hands flew open and I started forward, listening, trembling, praying. Twelve! I could feel the very vibrations of the bell beating against my temples as the iron tongue struck the side. Thirteen! Thank God! He had befriended me in my hour of need. I fell fainting to the floor, and from sheer exhaustion slept till daybreak.

I believe that the judges would have reinstated me, could they have been allowed to use their own discretion, but powerful enemies were at work against me and the freshly sawed slot in the striking wheel of the clock was discovered, and I was again summoned for further trial. The guards swore that no person had access to me after my arrest, and thus left a doubt in their minds. This doubt caused them to modify the death sentence to solitary confinement in the lower dungeon of the tower. What modification!

Better death than that; better to know that one swift stroke would end all earthly suffering and that revengful enmity could never more assail me.

But prisoners had escaped from this very tower before, and why not again? I would wait for the unfolding of the future's mysterious problems, hope for those almost miraculous changes that sometimes shift the power of a sovereign in the twinkling of an eye; strive, if I could, but what is the strife of one close kept within a rock bound cell! So in my solitude I sat for hours, brooding upon my condition. Then came the desire to know my surroundings more intimately. How well I know each stone, each line and fissure!

I could press my hands upon a bed of yielding clay and reproduce the walls of my cell so accurately that a mold of one would fit the other so closely a stream of water could not trickle though between them. Each stone I hate, save those I moved aside and broke against each other to use as implements of toil.

My cell was nine feet high, five feet broad and ten feet deep. Two bars of iron inserted in the solid rock supported four boards six inches wide and two inches in thickness, which, with a coarse blanket and a sack of straw, composed my bed. Along the outer edge of the planks was fastened another one, extending one and a half inches above the edge, a three legged stool and a billet of wood, to place beneath the sack of straw for a pillow, completed the equipment of the cell.

Through an opening in the heavy door I could see damp walls and heavy doors. Through this opening, at irregular intervals, was thrust a loaf of bread and a jug of water, and at times a piece of meat would be left, without a word, upon the shelf at the opening. Many a time have I raised the jug to dash it against the stones and with the ragged edge sever an artery, but each time the faint spark of hope has stayed my hand. During the first few days, thoughts of the injustice that had been done to me and the strangeness of my surroundings gave food for reflection, and motionless I sat upon my bed with my head buried in my hands, hours, days, perhaps weeks, for I could no longer measure time.

Then came the revulsion of feeling, the desire to be up and doing, the thirst for companionship. I would cry aloud, shriek, ay, even curse to drive away the madness that seemed to haunt the place, but all in vain; my own voice was not the one I longed to hear, and back would come that indefinable dread, that told me I must save myself from despair or reason would desert me.

Oh! you who wander forth into the blessed woodlands and say you have alone; you who drift out from shore in an open boat, with your eyes fixed upon the skies above you and say you are alone, what can you know of such solitude as mine, where not even the gnawing of a rat breaks the unending silence. Hour after hour I toyed with the pieces of the lantern. Each one had its name; each to me was a living thing with a personality.

The little pin that held its door in place, I would throw away and then search for it. Again and again I throw it, hoping it would lodge in some crevice and bring a new sensation when I failed to find it.

Wearied with this I would count The hairs of my beard, seperating one from another and then beginning over again, assuming that the count had been incorrect.

One day my food was thrust through the opening to me and in the meat a bone of peculiar shape, not unlike a laborer's pick, gave rise to thoughts which, for some strange reason, had never visited me before. I kept it and sharpening it against the stone, began to dig away the wood on the edge of my bed. I struck something hard.

Joy! The pinions were of iron. Here was a hope, here was an occupation, here was the tools to labor with. Oh! how I worked, and ere long held in my hand six spikes four inches long. Day after day with these I picked and scraped and dug at the stone wall of my cell until at last I loosened a stone, then another and then another, and then came to the moist earth. Again and again I kissed that soil, calling it by endearing names, as a mother would call a child that had been lost and restored. Using the fragments of stone to save my hands, I loosened the soil, filled the broken lantern, and brought it back into my cell, filling the corners, stowing it away under the bed and spreading it on the planks where I slept. But my cell would not hold all the dirt I must move before I could hope to make an exit. I must have a place for it or all my labors would be in vain. Hoping against hope, I began to dig at the wall opposite the door. The spikes were almost worn away before the opening was made, but my efforts were not unavailing, for beyond the wall there had been, at some distant time, four cells like my own. These had been thrown into one. The doors had been walled up with solid masonry, and it remained, I suppose, only as a support to the structure above.

Into this walled inclosure I packed away the earth as fast as I could lossen it and bring it back.

I had proceeded but twenty or thirty feet when I found a treasure of inestimable value to me, a broken sword, rusty and crumbling at the end and edges, but still substantial enough to serve in place of the worn out spikes.

The hilt had once been richly jeweled, but most of the gems were gone. The few remaining I removed with a piece of broken stone, and wrapping them in a fragment of my clothing treasured carefully in the fond hope that some day I should see the streets of London again. With this new implement my work proceeded more favorably, and using my own length for a measure, I estimated that I had pushed along 20 feet.

I then began to incline my course upward, and ere many days had passed I knew by the quantity of earth in the cells that I must be nearing the surface. Onward and upward I crept, and yet no sounds to tell me that I was nearing my goal. I had stowed away all that I could. I would now dig straight up and press the waste against the sides of my tunnel. by placing my back against one side.

Then came the thought, May I not be under the Thames! Will the swift influx of water flood my cell and bear to them the unwritten story of my struggles?"

I knew that I must be beyond the double wall, if I had come out on the side with the gates. It was my only hope, and that failing me death would be welcome, so I pushed upward.

How my heart throbs as I recall that instant, when, pushing through the turf, I felt the air of heaven again blowing across my face! I had come out into the open space diagonally across from the tower gate. The stars were shining in the sky, and now and then a cloud swept over the moon as though to shroud my escape.

Grasping what was left of the broken sword, I climbed up to the level ground. Not a soul was in sight. Lame and weak as I was, some strange, new found power impelled me onward, and I fled, not knowing, naught caring whither I was tending. If I met any one I do not know it. My blood seemed on fire. I was free. Let them take me back to-morrow if they would. I had tasted the air of freedom again, and now I could die. On, on I went, until at last nature, weak, worn and exhausted, left me panting at the door of an inn. I recall the keeper's burly form and red good natured face, and then my senses must have left me, for I awoke to find myself in this bed where I am writing. I have seen only the little girl who brought me materials for writing and I have sent down the jewels from the sword hilt to compensate the innkeeper for his care. I shall see him to-morrow, and then I shall know if those who love me still live; if those for whom I have cared will now care for this broken reed that the storms of life have blasted. In the seventh house beyond the wooden bridge at Herne Hill road I left my wife and children. Shall I see them again? Shall I ever——

Here the MS. breaks off, incomplete, and in a scrawling hand, probably that of the innkeeper, are these words:

"Written by an old and ragged man with long white hair and beard, who died in the kitchen chamber of the Blue Bird inn. We have, as duty called, sent to the seventh house from the wooden bridge, on Herne Hill road, but a happy family lives therein, who seek no aged, dying man, and know not who he may be.—James Clarence Harvey.

The Tollet of Death.

Towards four or five o'clock, when everything is ready outside, the warden of the prison, accompanied by several officials, goes to the condemned man's cell, and, shaking him by the shoulder, announces that his demand for a pardon has been rejected, says a Paris letter. As soon as the prisoner has dressed himself he is, if he so desires, left alone with the chaplain for a few moments; afterwards he is led to the toilet room. First, his shirt collar is cut away sufficiently to allow the guillotine knife to fall upon his bare neck; then he is fastened with a cord starting from the shoulders and connecting with another cord that binds the two wrists; a third cord goes from the wrist to the knees, where it is joined to another cord already passed around the legs.

Thus strapped the culprit is obliged to march as straight as an I, with his head thrown back. When the preparations are ended the procession starts for the guillotine, the prisoner being supported by two of the headsman's aids and accompanied by the executioner, the chaplain and the other officals. The huge prison doors are thrown open and the first object the condemned man sees is the black trapeziform knife concealed from his gaze. The distance from the door to the guillotine is scarcely twenty steps, and as soon as the criminal reaches the swinging board the chaplain quits him, the executioner seizes him and pushes him on to to the bascule. Pan! Pan! a click and a thud; the fall of the knife, the heavy sound of the body falling into the brand box. The movements are almost simultaneous. The knife falls. The criminal disappears.

As soon as the ceremony is over the body is placed in a wagon and conveyed to Ivy Cemetery, where it is buried in the turnip field. When the parents reclaim the body and it is interred in another part of the cemetery no name is ever put upon the headstone, in order not to excite curiosity When the body is not reclaimed the Prefect of Police authorizes the Faculty of Medicine to take it. Strictly speaking, the corpse ought not to be delivered to the Faculty until after twenty-four hours, this delay being accorded to the family to make its demand; but the custom is to give up the body immediately after a simulated burial when the authorities are certain that it will not be reclaimed.

During the whole of this lugubrious ceremony the chief executioner never touches the victim. The toilet and all the operations that require contract with his person are performed by the aids.

They Took off Their High Hats.

A novel mode of dealing with the female high hat nuisance in theatres was employed at the Savoy theatre London. There were a number of ladies in the amphitheatre with hats which prevented the "gods" from getting a good view of the stage. They, therefore, handed down a paper, on which a request to the ladies to remove their headgear was written in a large round hand, and which was passed from hand to hand along the front rows. Some of the ladies at once took off their hats; and, in the next interval, another paper was sent down in the same way, thanking them for their kind and obliging conduct.—Buffalo News.

HE KISSED HER.

He kissed her!
And was it his fault that her cheery red lips
Were sweeter than honey the honey bee sips?
And was it his fault that the breath from that mouth
Was fragrant and warm as a breeze from the South?

He kissed her!
And was it his fault that he read in her eyes,
Whose blue was a match for the sunniest skies,
A language which utterance coyly defied,
But love could not misunderstand if it tried?

He kissed her!
He kissed her? Of course he did kiss her. And then?
Why, then, dearest reader, he kissed her again.
And surely he must be a faint hearted churl
Who'd risk naught to kiss such a cheery lipped girl.

THE SNOWSTORM.

The snow fell, almost without interruption, for two entire days. First the road was coated with a fine dry powder, like white grains of frost, swept along by the wind; then another kind of snow begun, coming in large, starry flakes, floating downward, like feathers, and alighting upon the ground with all the easy grace of something alive and conscious. The snow did not content itself with covering the beaten paths; having begun by melting on the sear turf and the spring hedges, it finally clung there and heaped itself up without respite or pause, until the whole landscape disappeared under a uniform mantle.

Toward evening of the preceding day, the sky had reddened for a little while, and the bank where the drifted snow made blue shadows become still bluer; then the sullen gray shut down again over the evening star; a light fell gray over the white earth also, a blank and gloomy day succeeded, and the little hamlets, not daring to stir from their frozen torpor, wondered if the world were coming to an end in the snow which still contiued to fall.

In the last house in the village street the door was shut with a wooden bar; a thread of blue smoke rising from the chimney mounted straight upward in the still air; the only light in the building came from the garden side, where a window opened upon the court yard. Under the great projecting hood of the dark chimney two young people were talking together, but their shoulders did not touch, though they were alone, their hands did not meet, their hearts did not beat in unison.

"The old man has gone to town?" asked the young fellow. His sullen air was probably not enough to express all his bad humor, for he added to it a morose tone of voice.

"He has gone after medicine for the sick cow," answered the young girl, "but I don't believe she will wait tor it; she may be dead by this time. How he will scold when he comes back!"

"Why don't you go and see her?" grumbled the young man.

She shrugged her shoulders. "It is not worth while—I can't do her any good, and besides, it makes me feel badly to see an animal suffer. I would rather not look at her."

She bent her head sadly toward the hearth, where a little fire of roots was burning, feeble and eager enough to satisfy the most parsimonious master. They were silent for a moment. A few flakes of snow fell down the chimney, shining in their fall with all the colors of the prism, then extinguished in the ashes.

"When will he come back?" asked the young man.

"At three o'clock. The stage leaves in an hour; he cannot be later," said the girl.

"He will be here in half an hour," he replied looking at the clock. "Listen to me, Melia, to tell the truth, I have something to say to you."

"I know what it is," said the young girl, with a look of pain,—you don't love me any longer."

The young man, embarrassed, made a movement of hesitation, then, returning to his original idea he resumed with cruel frankness: "Oh, yes, I love you still; we have been great friends; there is a feeling left—"

"Oh, I understand; you don't love me as you did last St. John's day; you don't want me for a sweetheart any longer."

He got up from the homely beach and took a few steps back and forth in the room. "Well; no! it is true," he said at last; "it is not my fault, love cannot be forced.

"That is not what you said when you asked me to love you; you said that your love for me deserved a reward, and that I ought to love you, I obeyed you, and now you tell me something else."

"Yes, it is something else," said John growing more and more sullen. "One wants a sweetheart for a little while to pass away the time—then, when the time comes, we must do as others do, and marry."

Amelia rose from her seat with a white face, her eyes fixed upon the face of the man who was throwing her on, and who lowered his own head, unable to bear her gaze.

"Are you going to be married?" she asked in a harsh voice.

"Yes—my parents wish it, and I cannot oppose them."

"And I?"

"What? You? I didn't promise to marry you in the end!" said the village Don Juan Brutally.

"Oh! no! you promised me nothing," she said.

"Then you admit it?"

"I admit it!" repeated the young girl, sitting down again. Her slender little frame was shaking even more with the shame of desertion than with the grief of a love scorned.

"I admit that you are right not to marry me, since I am only a foundling, brought up by charity, a servant today in the house of the old man who picked me up. Oh, no; folks do no marry such a girl as I! You are right, John. Your intended is rich?"

"H'm, pretty well off," answered John, caressing his moustache with a satisfied manner. Amelia was taking it well; that put him in a good humor.

"And pretty?"

"As for that, only so-so!" answered the lover, scratching his ear. "But we have not had the wedding yet; that will not be until Easter; it takes them so long to get ready. Meanwhile, little 'Melia—if you will—we can have a good time a few weeks longer. You are pretty,—prettier than my intended. Indeed you are!"

He tried to take the young girl by the waist to kiss her stained cheeks. She sprang back and leaning back against the chimney piece and looking the man whom she had loved, she spat in his face.

"Go away!" she cried, while the astounded John mechanically tried to wipe off the insult with his sleeve, looking at her with protruding eyes full of rage.

"Get out," she repeated, "or I will kill you!" She had picked up the fire shovel, and brandished it so near John's face that he prudently recoiled toward the door that opened into the garden.

"As you like," he muttered, "as you like. I didn't mean to make you angry; there's nothing to get in a rage about."

"Go away," exclaimed the girl once more, but this time without any menace. The rage had vanished from her face which now expresssed only disgust.

He beat a retreat and went out, shutting the door behind him. For one moment his silhouette darkened the little light which entered through the greenish glass of the window; then he disappeared and Amelia returned back again to the hearth.

She did not cry; there are blows that break the heart, and others that kill the body, without making either tears or blood flow, and these are not the less painful. She looked at her past life as one looks at a work ill done—a failure. It was on a winter's day like this that her dying mother had been carried to the poorhouse, holding her in her arms. The only word which the poor creature could pronounce was a name,—Amelia. Was it her own or that of her child, then three years old? What did it matter. The child was called Amelia; they buried the mother, and all was over.

Old James, who was not young then, had picked up the little creature when she was about seven years old—she had belonged to nobody—and had promoted her to the rank of a servant. Servant—a child who was only a beggar! That was a change in social position, and Amelia was grateful to the old man for having raised her to that dignity. Very small but intelligent and docile, she had served him according to her childish strength—often beyond it—asking no other wages than her daily bread.

The old man was gross and rude, and often spoke too roughly; but he had never struck the orphan, restrained, perhaps by that misfortune which had no other protection. Amelia's life had rolled on in this cabin, between the cows and the chickens, without joys, without hopes, without dreams of a future.

Of what could she dream?

John noticed her one day; then he made love to her. On St. John's day he had chosen her for the dance. Then it was that the girl's heart had known the pride of being loved and the humbler joy of loving.

She did not love the old man; she feared him. She loved the little calves and the kids; all of these pets had disappeared in the wagon that carried produce to town. Foundlings have no friends among those of their own age; their relations are sure to say to them, "We don't know where any one comes from before you show her any tenderness!

John loved her! He preferred her to all others! Her poor little heart swelled with gratitude at the thought that he, the handsomest and best in the village, did not despise a foundling. She loved him with all her strength, for she tasted for the first time of tenderness and love.

He was going to be married. He had had enough of her! Not enough, however, since he had dared— At the semblance she shivered at the insult, hiding in her two hands her dry and burning eyes and her forehead, red with shame.

He had not loved her—that was plain. While she had dreamed of consecrating life to him, imagine the acts of impossible devotion to lay at his feet, he was seeking a mere pastime to while away the period leading up to the marriage! A deep, irrevocable bitterness found its way to the heart of this child, to whom no one had taught resignation, and who revolted against injustice. Anger and resentment, these were to be her daily companions.

Nothing is more cruel to an innocent soul than the sudden entrance of the wicked feelings, piercing the heart like a cold sword. These unwelcome guests are even harder to endure than the wrong which cause them to arise. Alas! say what they may, it is not from choice that any one becomes bad; the apprenticeship to sin has many a torture!

While Amelia was torn by rage and indignation, the outer door opened, and the old man entered covered with snow. He shook himself upon the threshold and entered his dwelling without one friendly word for her who kept the hearth.

"Well," he exclaimed, "how's the cow?"

"She is no better," answered the little servant mechanically.

"I must go to her," grumbled James, going out again.

"She is dead!" he cried, striking his stick upon the stone sill; "she is cold, and you, you good-for-nothing, you haven't even looked at her."

"I did go, master," Amelia answered, getting up; "I thought I could do nothing and I did not go again."

"You lie," cried the old man shaking with rage; "you haven't put your foot out of doors! You were afraid of the cold, you are as dainty as a fine lady; you stayed here to warm your feet."

He had come to the glass door, and there he preceived the footmarks which the snow had not yet entirely concealed. The weather had lightened a little, the white flakes had almost ceased falling.

"Hold on!" he cried, stammering with rage, "this is why you took no care of the cattle, why you have done nothing! Mademouselle had a lover who comes to see her; the converse together instead of working! A lover a lover for 'Melia! What scapegrac would court such a girl as that!"

Amelia smilled bitterly and crossed her arms to wait for his anger to pass.

"A lover! for a foundling! A wretched girl that I had the kindness to pick up, who has never helped me at any thing! Since you came to my house misfortune has followed me. Before that I was rich and I saved something; now, money goes one dosn't know where. You have brought me bad luck, bird of ill omen! I will put back in the street what I have taken from the street where I ought to have left it. What a fool I was that day!"

The clear voice of Amelia rose all at once and drowned the enraged reproaches of the old man.

I have brought you bad luck, master; it may be so but I did not intend to. I have worked my best and I asked no pay. If I have brought you bad luck, I am going to give you another chance for I am going away, and I shall cost nothing more."

The troubled eyes of the old man met the clear and disdainful glance of the young girl. Within the hour she had drained the bitter cup; a drop more or less mattered little.

"Go where you like, child of the devil!" screamed James furious at seeing her hold up her head before him, "nobody wants you here! You must be a witch's daughter!"

"Perhaps so!" answered the little servant, lifting the latch of the door. "Good by, master; may God give back the luck which I made you lose."

She opened the door. Her outlines, slim and delicate in spite of the coarse woolen clothes she wore, were drawn for an instant upon the white depth of the new-fallen snow. It did not snow at all, but the air of approaching evening seemed full of nameless grief, like the eyes and the mouth of a child ready to burst into tears.

The door closed; James left alone, muttered, "Good riddance!"

Taking off the clothes which he had worn on his journey he put on those which he wore every day, then lighted a lantern, for the daylight was rapidly decreasing, and returned to the dead cow. He touched her with his hand, assured himself that she was certainly dead, and came back to the house, still grumbling and complaining.

The supper hour came, there was no one to think of it for him: he got a sauce pan and some vegetables in a basket, seated himself on a low stool, the basket between his knees, and began to prepare his own supper. While with awkward efforts he slowly peeled some potatoes; he began to think of all that had just happened.

She was gone! Well, so much the better! With her little hands and her little feet, for which there were no sabots small enough, she was a miserable servant. What one wants on a farm is a stout girl with big hands and big feet, who will not bend under the heaviest pails of milk.

And then she was headstrong this 'Melia. It didn't take much to make her angry. If you so much as spoke of her birth, she got as red as a turkey cock and her eyes shown like fire. She was not born for a servant, surely, for she did not know how to bear scolding.

So all at once she was gone—God knows where. Wouldn't it have been better quietly to go about getting the supper? But she always had a devil of a temper.

Always? No. What a gentle little creature she was when she was a little thing; when she sat in his lap and called him Papa James. She was very good then, and long afterward. In that sickness which he had, she had obeyed the doctor's instructions like a little woman, so that one day the doctor himself had stroked her head and told her that it was she who had saved the old man's life.

How old was she then! About 12 or 13 years. It was at that time James, who had neither children nor near relation, had thought about making a will and leaving his property to his little maid. But he had never told any one, for they say it is bad luck to make a will, and James didn't want to die before his time.

Was it after that sickness that she had grown so pretty? It must have been after that, for when the doctor had praised her, she was very pale and thin. Weariness no doubt, for she had not slept for 15 nights, and she did not get over it until the next winter. Yes, she grew very pretty; if the young men had noticed her, James might have had trouble enough, but the young men paid no attention and that is easy to understand. A foundling.

She would never marry, of course. Who the devil had been courting her? Well, it made no difference now that she was gone. Gone? Bah! Folks say that they are going, but then, they think better of it when supper time comes. She would soon come back.

The minutes rolled on. Father James went on peeling potatoes, and naturally he peeled enough for two, since she must be coming back. When he thought that he had enough he listened, expecting to hear the latch lifted. But nobody came.

"She is outside the door," he said to himself, afraid to come in. Bah! We must put up with the faults of youth, and she must be cold." He got up, shut his knife and put it in his pocket, an old habit with a peasant; then waited a moment.

"She won't come in alone," he muttered. "I'll open the door for her." He stole to the door as softly as his wooden shoes allowed, and opened it.

There was nobody there.

He recoiled in affright as if he had seen a ghost, and an inexplicable fear made his gray hair rise under his wool hat. He was not a coward, however, and he took two steps forward. His tracks made in returning from town were almost effaced by the snow; other fresh tracks took the same road in the opposite direction. They were Amelia's, recognized by the smallness of the print; for the snow had ceased to fall. They were rather wide apart, deep, the heel well-marked like those of a person running. The old man rubbed his eyes, and said aloud:—

"She must be somewhere in the village." He turned his head toward the houses, but no track was to be seen in that direction.

In spite of himself, denying the evidence, he exclaimed, "It cannot be!"

Day had already disappeared, but the gray sky, full of snow, was not dark, and the whiteness of the earth made the least track easily recognizable. Forgetting to shut the door of his house behind him, poor Father James followed the marks of the little feet bent a little forward, like a man who is looking for something.

After a few strides the track took a reasonable pace again. Amelia had stopped running, without much slackening her steps. One after the other the pretty little feet, so unfit for the heavy tasks of the fields, had taken their way through the snow, following the road to the town.

When he had gone nearly a mile, Father James stopped for a breath of air. A flake of snow fell on his beard and another on his hand. Raising his head and looking before him, he cried, "Little One!"

That was what he used to call her when she was more of a plaything than a servant to him; it was a pet name which she always answered with a smile.

"Little One!" repeated the old man, and he thought with confidence, "She will understand at once that I forgive her."

There was no answer. He pressed on, following the little feet printed in the snow, which seemed to go on before him toward some unknown destination. But the flakes began to fall again, thicker and thicker; the sky became blacker, and shut down upon the earth; night was coming on, Night; that was nothing. But the storm!

The foot-prints, at first so plain, even at a distance, were filling up with new snow; there was now only faint marks to be seen. The old man walked slowly, bent almost double in order to distinguish these faint traces; from time to time he straightened himself up and cast toward the low, black sky his no longer confident, but despairing appeal, "Little One!"

And the thick air gave no response —not even an echo!

Still searching out the little footprints under the snow by an effort which made his head swim, he reached the high road, that which he had left two hours before, where the stag ought to have passed not long since on its way to the city. But there—nothing to be seen! The little feet were lost under the thick bed of snow; the flakes, more and more numerous, thicker and thicker, fell slowly, forming before the glassy eyes of the poor old man a frozen and impenetrable veil. Standing in the road where his own tracks were already effaced, he gazed at the horizon to the right and to the left, questioning it with a fathomless anxiety, and, in a voice choked with tears, he uttered once more his vain cry, "Little One!"

The Invalid and the Violinist.

An old and infirm soldier was playing his violin one evening on the Prater, in Vienna. His faithful dog was holding his hat, in which passers by dropped a few coppers as they came along. However, on the evening in question, nobody stopped to put a small coin into the poor old fellow's hat. Everyone went straight on, and the gaiety of the crowd added to the sorrow in the old soldiers heart, and showed itself in his withered countenance.

However, all at once, a well-dressed gentleman came up to where he stood listened to his playing for a few minutes, and gazed compassionately upon him. Ere long, the old fiddler's weary hand no longer strength to grasp his bow. His limbs refused to carry him farther. He seated himself on a stone, rested his head on his hands, and began to weep silently. At that instant the gentleman approached, offered the old man a piece of gold, and said: "Lend me your violin a little while."

Then, having carefully tuned it, he said:

"You take the money, and I'll play."

He did play! All the passers-by stopped to listen—struck with the distinguished air of the musician, and captivated by his marvelous genius. Every moment the circle became larger and larger. Not copper alone, but silver—and even gold—was dropped into the poor man's hat. The dog began to growl, for it was becoming too heavy for him to hold. At an invitation from the audience, the invalid emptied its contents into his sack, and they filled it again.

After a national melody, in which everyone present joined, with uncovered heads, the violinist placed the instrument upon the poor man's knees, and, without waiting to be thanked, disappeared.

"Who is it?" was asked on all sides.

"It is Armand Boucher, the famous violin-player," replied some one in the crowd. "He has been turning his art to account in the service of charity. Let us follow his example."

And the speaker sent round his hat also, made a new collection, and gave the proceeds to the invalid, crying, "Long live Boucher!"

Deeply affected, the invalid lifted up his hands and eyes towards Heaven, and invoked God's blessing on his benefactor.

That evening there were two happy men in Vienna—the invalid, placed for a long time above the reach of want, and the generous artist, who felt in his heart the joy which always repays the bestowal of charity.—The Angelus.

In Wyoming the school fund is to be raised by leasing the school lands at 5 per cent. per annum of their appraised value, the lessee to have the option of renewal at the annual value of the land at the time of renewal. Thus the territory of Wyoming is doing with its school lands what Henry George would do with all land. In this way the state, and not private individuals, will get the increase in value that comes from increased population.

There is a very dangerous $5 counterfeit bill in circulation, and those fortunate enough to handle money of this denomination are very liable to be caught if not on the alert. The bill is of the new department series of 1886 and is almost perfect in execution. It can be detected by the fact that in the cut of Gen. Grant, the engraving on the right lapel of his coat is rough, the studs are missing from his shirt bosom and there is a distinct, but very small white mark in the right hand corner of his mouth that does not belong there.

The average natural age of the oak is from 1,500 to 2,000 years; of the elm 350 to 500 years; the maple 600 to 800 years; the yew tree, the largest of all, 2,500 to 3,000 the cedar, 800; linden, 1,200, and cypress, 350. There are trees now standing, believed to be more than 5,000 years old. In this connection we remember the words of Susan Fenimore Cooper several years ago: "Of all the works of creation, that know the changes of life and death, the trees of the forest have the longest existence; of all the objects that crown the gray earth, the trees preserve, throughout the greatest reach of time, their native character."

The "Drop a Nickle" Machine.

In these days a man can drop a nickle in the slot and realize almost anything. He can get his correct weight, test his lungs, grip and pushing power, ascertain his height, draw out a cigar or a package of bon bons, or he can get an insurance policy good for a certain number of hours. The latest device, however, is bound to make a fortune for the men who get the "take off." The machine is set up in depots, and the ear of the man who drops a nickel in the slot is occupied for a few moments by a pleasing tune from a music box inside. Those who have ever been obliged to spend an hour or two in a depot waiting for a train will gladly give up a handful of nickels for something which will occupy their time and attention. The projectors of this nickel movement, however, have numbered days, as there is a machine just put in the field which tells a man's correct weight for 1 cent.—Chicago Herald.

AFTER MANY YEARS.

BY CHAS. A. DEVITT.

In a quiet little village on the banks of the Hudson River lived pretty Susie Morrow. With rosy cheeks, an elastic step that proclaimed the vigor of her lithe frame, tawny hair, proclaimed by the envious to be "red" and by the partial-minded "golden," but which hung in rich profusion to her waist, and eyes that sparkled and danced with mischief, while their light blue depths had been the tomb in which lay buried the loves of half the village lads, she certainly was entitled to be called "pretty." Her father had been a ship carpenter, and when she was but a child he had died possessed of but little property, and that little had been the means of sustenance to Susie and her mother until now, when, with a cold, bleak winter coming on, coal and the necessities of life dear, Mrs. Morrow drew the last sixpence from her treasured hoard, and with a sigh gave it to the butcher's boy who had just left the meat for dinner. The cottage in which they lived still remained to them, and thus they escaped the tyranny of an over-bearing landlord, but the fact still remained that something must be done, and that very quickly, or the wolf would soon be at the door, and this was the subject of discussion between Susie and her mother. Not long before John McKenzie, a grocer, young a well-to-do in the world's goods, with an established and constantly increasing trade, had tendered his heart, hand and bank account to Susie, who was now nearly twenty years of age, and not one whit less engaging than a child of 10. But Susie, who, like other maidens of her age, had her own ideas of love and marriage, could not forget that a year before she had said good-bye to George Matson a young man of gook character, honest and trustworthy, but, poor in pocket and without that boon that is the right of the poor man as well as the rich, a trade or profession. George had been working in a hardware store, and the failure of the firm left him without a situation and without money enough to pay a parson, let alone supporting a family. He and Susie had conned the matter closely, and it was decided that George should seek his fortune in some other country, and he, in an instant, decided upon China as affording opportunities for his ambitious nature. Susie was to wait two years for him, and if, at the expiration of that time he had not returned, she would be perfectly free to act her own pleasure in regard to matrimony.

Accordingly her lover boarded the first ship he could find bound for a Chinese port. They parted with fresh pledges of love, and hearts filled with great hope for the future. Six months passed and the girl heard not a word from her lover. A year went by and still no letter from the absent one. Susie had grown almost distracted, for in addition to her fears for his personal safety, a doubt began to slowly force its way into her heart of the constancy of her lover. It was at this time that John McKenzie began to pay his attention to her, and finally asked her hand in marriage. Mrs. Morrow, though a kind and loving mother, took the practical view of the matter, thought of the many comforts and advantages which such a union meant to them both—for John had assured her of a home with them—and urged her daughter to become McKenzie's wife. Susie thought of her vow to the absent one and said that not until the year had expired should she give the matter a thought. Her last negative had angered her mother and she gave her views in a forcible and decided manner.

"There is no reason for you to suppose that George Matson cares anything for you, even if he is alive, or he would have written to you. Why should you waste the best years of your life waiting for him, when you have a good home offered you? I can stand this pinching poverty no longer. Susie, my child you are breaking my heart. Marry John McKenzie and we shall be surrounded with every comfort. Refuse, and you condemn your mother as well as yourself to a life of abject poverty. It is not many men who would accept the cast-off love of another man, and it is only his great love for you that causes John McKenzie to do it."

McKenzie added his voice to the mother's, urging Susie to become the mistress of his home, and she, overcome with the ardor of his suit and her mother's entreaties, gave her word that when the two years were up she would marry him on the following day, if her former lover did not return.

Time flew on and still no letter came. Susie grew pale and wan, but gave herself up to the inevitable, as she now fully believed George to be dead. It was nearing the end of the year and Mrs. Morrow had made quite an advance in the preparations of the trousseau, with which Susie would have nothing to do. In fact the poor girl had no heart for anything, but thought and dreamed only of her absent lover and the tender words he had spoken. When John McKenzie uttered words of love they found but an echo in her heart of the words she had heard from the lips of her one love, and she made no response. People who were friends of the family saw the great changes in the girl's appearance. The cheeks that had once been as plump as a peach and rosy as the dawn of a summer morning were now sunken and pale. The elasticity was gone from her tread; her bright eyes had lost their merry sparkle, and the dark circles beneath them told of sleepless nights and anxious days, and she was pitied accordingly.

And how fared it with George Matson? He had sailed for that Eastern country on a gallant ship and with as fair a wind as ever wafted a vessel from our shores. His heart was light with joyous expectation of golden days to come, when with a fortune in his pocket he could return to the little cottage on the Hudson and claim his bride. Bnt alas! for the uncertainty of human expectation. The heart may be filled with the hope of longings to be soon realized—fate interposes and they are left trembling in the balance or dashed to pieces on the sharp rocks of destiny. When but ten days out the ship was struck by a gale that stripped her of every rag of canvas and drove her head-on to the rocky shores of a small island. Nearly all were rescued from the sea and reached the shores, but were not discovered and taken off for nearly three months. They were well supplied with food and the necessaries of life from the ship's cargo, so there was no privation or suffering in this, but, oh, to the lover's impatient soul what an amount of suffering this enforced imprisonment occasioned.

They at last signaled an eastbound steamer whose captain took them aboard, kindly cared for them, and landed them at a small seaport town on the Chinese coast. From here George made his way to the interior, and finally obtained a position in the warehouse of one of the great American tea companies. By perseverance, honesty and good business qualities he soon was promoted successively to general warehouseman, and finally to the position of general superintendent of the shipping interests of the tea company. He had saved a large proportion of his salary and had written regularly to Susie that as soon as his savings had reached a certain figure he would come home to marry her. None of his letters ever reached their destination, and the result the reader knows. George had become alarmed at the long silence, and four weeks before the day appointed for his return had taken passage with an American steamer, and was soon on his way home, to Susie and happiness. But an adverse fate seemed to attend him. The boat was delayed, and he landed on the company's New York wharf only twelve hours before the time set for the marriage of John McKenzie and Susie Morrow. The up-train had been gone an hour when he reached the depot, and he contented himself with thinking of the short distance that now separated him from Susie, and in anticipating her joy and the pleasure which would attend his arrival.

At Susie's home the busy preparations for the wedding were at an end, the guests—a few old friends of the family—were beginning to arrive, the bride was dressed, and they were only awaiting the coming of the minister who was to perform the ceremony. Susie sat by the window of her own little room, seeming not to realize the situation, as indeed the poor child scarcely did, for her thoughts were with the absent one. Where he was she knew not, but her heart went out with a great longing after him, that was scarcely loyal to her promised husband, and the tears fell like rain unheeded upon her white wedding dress.

A ring at the door interrupted the flow of conversation among the guests, and Mrs. Morrow responded to it. A tall, sun-browned, bearded man stepped into the hall.

"Mrs. Morrow, is it possible you do not know me," asked the visitor.

"I surely do not remember your face," said Mrs. Morrow, "yet your voice is like one I once knew. It can't be—"

"Yes, I am George Matson," said he, seeming to anticipate what she was about to say, "and I am come to see and claim my little Susie. Where is she?"

Before Mrs. Morrow could frame a reply a low cry was heard, and a light figure came flying down the stairway. Susie had heard and recognized her lover's voice and sprung to meet him. Throwing herself into his arms she sobbed out the sorrow of her long-suffering, aching heart. When she was calmed, John McKenzie was called and full explanations followed. When the minister did arrive the guests were astonished to see Susie enter the room on the arm of the bearded stranger and stand before him, while John McKenzie supported Mrs. Morrow. The twain were made one flesh, and John McKenzie, who, like the honorable gentleman that he was, had waived all right in the matter, was the first to extend his congratulations to the young couple, and made the necessary explanations. Turning to the company he said:

"Although I had expected to have now been the husband of this charming girl, whom I have loved, and still love with a man's true love, yet I know that in giving her up I am but promoting her true happiness and that of a good and noble man, who will make her a loving husband. He has waited and worked hard for, and deserves the happiness he may now enjoy. As for me, I shall hope they will sometimes remember me, in their new home far away, and will think kindly of me."

Susie, taking his hand thanked him, while tears of happiness filled her sweet blue eyes, while her husband said, with outstreched hand:

"You have but to ask and you need not fear George Matson's friendship. We cannot forget what we owe you, and shall remember you as long as we live."

How well they did remember is shown in the fact in that far-away clime where they dwell, a sunny haired boy rejoices in the name of John McKenzie Matson, and John has promised to soon cross the ocean to see his little namesake, and visit them in their Eastern home. He is a confirmed old bachelor, and when his friends ask him why he does not marry, he replies: "My romance in life has come and gone. Perhaps it will return "After Many Years."

DIGBY'S REFORM CLUB

There was a quartette of free and jovial spirits in Burville, and Johnny Digby was the acknowledged leader thereof. Peter Slade, Tom Lowden and Sam Pepper were his associates. They were four young men, free hearted and generous, with a great capability for enjoyment.

On a certain Monday evening they were assembled in a small parlor of Lushton's tavern for the purpose of having a good time, as they were wont to assemble often. The season was winter, and the beverage they were indulging in was a compound of rum, sugar, milk and eggs, familiarly known as "Tom and Jerry."

At the early stage of the wassail, before sense had been submerged, Peter Slade had suggested that he had a complaint to make against one of the dignitaries of the town, and thereupon he opened up his vials of denunciation against Parson Meekly, the old clergyman of the place.

"As near as I can find out," he said, "the parson has just the same as called us by name and held us up as a set of graceless scamps."

"Not certainly as bad as that," said John Digby. "He did certainly allude to us very plainly, but the worst he brought against us was that we were prostituting noble powers and opportunities to base sinful pleasures. Rather flattering, I thought—especially the noble powers."

"Flattering with a vengeance," said Tom Lowden. "What business is it of his?"

"Aye." said Sam Pepper, "what business is it of his? And then look at the hullabaloo they made over this foreign mission business. It was in connection with that that Parson Meekly attacked us. They had better look at home. I think there is suffering enough under their very noses that had better be looked to first."

"That's so," said Slade. "I say charity begins at home. What do say, John?"

John Digby had listened attentively, and during the conversation he had turned his glass bottom up on the tavern table.

"There may be truth in what you say," he slowly and thoughtfully replied, "but people who live in glass houses should not throw stones. We may object to furnishing money to these foreign missions upon the plea that charity begins at home and all that but the question may come back. What have we done for this charity at home? What have we done to alleviate the distress of the poor of our town? And if we haven't done anything in that direction—if we don't open our hand in charity at all—what right have we to say in what direction others shall aim then good works?"

Blank were the looks that greeted this speech. The trio listeners were taken aback. They hadn't expected this from their leader.

"Now look here boys," continued John Digby, pushing his inverted glass away to the center of the table, and leaving it there. "I don't like this overhauling that Parson Meekly gave us any better than you do, and I propose to shut him up."

"Hi-yah!" shouted Sam Pepper: "that's the talk. I'm with you."

"Are you sure you have got the courage Sam?"

"Yes, sir."

"Count me in," said Tom.

"And me," added Pepper. "Let us shut the old fellow up. What's the programme, Jack?"

"Well," answered Digby, "I have planned that we take the wind out of Parson Meekly's sails by establishing a reform club of our own, and starting a missionary society on the same basis."

"Eh?"

"Look ye, boys; people beside the parson are talking hard about us, and we'll shut them all up in a lump. I'd like to hit back in the most effective way, I'd like to make them take the back track here in Burville in their own business."

His hearers were interested and listening eagerly.

"What is it? Tell us how this is to be done?"

"Have you the courage to do it?" said John.

"We'll follow you," said Peter Slade.

"Honor bright?"

"Yes."

"Then listen."

"Hold on," cried Sam Pepper. "Let's fill up before we commence."

"Not with old Lushton's Tom and Jerry." returned Jack. "We shall want the cost of it for another purpose. Turn the glasses bottom side up for the present. Now listen. We are in the habit of meeting here at the tavern three evenings in the week; and our expenses for liquors and cigars are at least two dollars an evening, aren't they?"

This was admitted by a nod.

"And in addition to this I spend at least a dollar more a week for beer and tobacco on my own hook. How is it with you?"

The others admitted that a dollar a week was enough.

"Thus," resumed John Digby, "we have $10 a week as the result of our combined and individual expenses for rum and tobacco. I, for one think I could manage to live through the rest of the winter without any more of it, and for the sake of the experiment I would be willing to put my share of that $10 to charitable uses. Here it is the beginning of December, and the winter has opened hard. There are poor families not far away which we can bless with our sympathy and help. We might organize a benevolent society, or a missionary society, on our own hook. Do you begin to understand.

They understood him perfectly; and since he would lead they were ready to follow.

In fact, they rather liked the idea. There was a charm of novelty and originality about it that captivated them. It would be fun to purchase flour and meat and tea and sugar and fuel, and go around to assist the poor and needy. They were young men, full of life and good feeling and had caroused only because of the fun of the thing. Here was promise of fun in another direction, and they would go into it.

The matter was discussed and finally settled. They would make a square week of it at the beginning.

"During the week," said Jack, "we will look up the cases of destitution and suffering, and on Saturday afternoon we will meet and compare notes. Then we will take our ten dollars and do what we can for those who are suffering most. We must be methodical in this. We are not to spend a penny in this work of charity that is not saved by cutting off some useless expenditure of our own; and he of us who buys a cigar during the week shall deduct it from his contribution on Saturday."

"If we should be methodical," suggested Peter, we must organize. I say if we are going to do anything of of this kind, let us do it ship shape."

Peter's proposition was unanimously accepted, and they proceeded to organize.

The organization arrived at, was simple but nevertheless effective. They elected John Digby to serve as president, and as secretary and treasurer; and they elected an executive committee of four, consisting of John Digby, Peter Slade, Tom Lowden and Sam Pepper.

And then they settled their bill at the bar and went home.

Saturday evening came, and the reform club met at Digby's shop, and each member was ready with his report. They had thought when they had separated on Monday evening they should meet with a spirit of frolic in their new work; but the scenes which they had witnessed in the interim had changed the current of their feelings entirely.

"My soul!" exclaimed Sam Pepper, "I never dreamed what sorrow and suffering there is here in our little town. Last night I went to the Widow Bashlot's, and I found her with a sick child, absolutely freezing and starving."

"And I," said Ton Lowden. "I found Uncle Ben Driscoll and wife both in the same plight. The old man is down with rheumatism; and when he and Aunt Sally set and cried like babies, with fear of going to the poorhouse, I tell you it brought the tears to my eyes."

And so the reports were made, and then they planned how they could best use their ten dollars. It seemed like a drop in the bucket, when set against all the want and suffering they had found, but it would do something.

On that Saturday evening the widow Bashlot bent over the bed of the sick child with weepings and wails of anguish. The howling blast piped without and the frost nipped within. She suffered because she had forced herself to beg. For herself she had rather die than become a pauper, but for her child—O, God, have mercy!

A wailing cry like this had burst from her lips, when a tramp at her door attracted her attention, and presently a gentle rap followed. She answered the summons and found four young men upon the stoop.

She knew them well, for they had been schoolmates with her son who had gone to sea and never returned. And they came into the house; they piled up the fuel on the hearth until the bright flames leaped and roared, and the sick child reached out its wasted arms to embrace the genial warmth.

They brought forth bread and tea and sugar and butter and cheese.

"All right," said Sam Pepper, who regarded them as his special charges, in answer to the woman's ejaculations of astonishment: "We are John Digby's Reform Club, and we are going into missionary work; and such folks as you are we want to convert—want to convert from suffering to comfort, if we can. So keep up a good heart, and let us do for you what your own Willie would have done if he had lived. It'll be a comfort to us. We'll call often. You shan't want if we can help it."

The widow's sobbing, bursting return of blessings cannot be reproduced by tongue or pen. When the young men reached the highway, Sam Pepper burst forth:

"Boys, as true as heaven, I would not exchange the blessing of that poor widow's heart for all the joys that ever came in the old way at the tavern. There's something more than fun in this."

And his companions agreed with him.

In another part of the town, on the outskirts of the village, in a poor thatched hut, lived Ben Driscoll and his wife Sally.

In other years they had been well and happy; and, though never forehanded, yet they had not known want till old age and sickness had deprived them of their ability to work. And on this cold winter's night, Uncle Ben and Aunt Sally sat and shivered over the heat of such stuff as they had been able to gather from the snow-covered hedges, and the old man sighed as he thought of the alms house.

"If we could only get through the winter. But who can help us?"

But old Uncle Ben and his wife were aroused from stupor of chill and hunger by the tramp of feet and hum of voices; and shortly the door opened and John Digby and his three companions entered.

A fire was speedily burning on the hearth, and a good store of provisions was opened out on the table.

The old man wondered and Tom Lowden made answer.

"It's all right, Uncle Ben. This is Jack Digby's Reform Club. We've stopped our rations of spirits and tobacco, and are going to invest the result in a missionary enterprise. We want to convert you and Aunt Sally, if we can."

"Convert us, Tom?"

"Aye—convert you to comfort and peace; and perhaps convert you to the belief that there is a grain of good left in humanity still. We mean to take you in hand the coming winter, and you shan't suffer if we can help it."

The boys did not leave the cot until they had helped the aged couple to a hearty meal, and had piled up fuel enough to last until they came again; and when they finally withdrew the song of their blessing was sounding in their ears.

And so the reformers went on until their night's work was done; and when they came to separate they declared that they had found such enjoyment as they had never known before.

During the succeeding week three new members were added to the club—men who were willing to cut off expenses for rum and tobacco and devote the proceeds to the relief of the poor and distressed of the town.

And ere long Digby's Reform club became a noted institution in that place. The projectors could hardly credit the evidence of their own senses in contemplating the result of their three months' labor. Two and twenty members had joined, and the fund for relief amounted to nearly $40 per week, and each man was pledged to pay in weekly the exact sum his spirits and tobacco cost him. If he continued to use tobacco, he took a lower place in the company, and the use of spirits as a beverage was sufficient cause for expulsion. When people saw the good that was being done, they were anxious to give aid, and be connected with the merry crew; but the laws of the club were fixed; no money could come to the fund except such as had been saved by the donor of some evil habit, or by cutting off some useless luxury.

It was a bright Sabbath in springtime, and it was given out that Parson Meekly was going to preach a sermon on Digby's reform club, and the old meeting house was filled to overflowing. The clergyman read his text from St. John's Gospel—"Can there any good come out of Nazareth? Come and see." And when he told the story of Digby's Retorn club and pictured the good result of its labors, he proclaimed to all, "Go ye and do likewise."

Once John Digby and his companions had fancied it would be a proud moment when they had brought the old parson to recognize the worth of their labors; but the blessings of those upon whom their bounties had fallen had made such sweet music in their ears, and the satisfaction of duties truly done had dropped so soothingly upon their souls, they found no room for that baser pride which they had before that time anticipated.

The American Girl.

It may fairly be acknowledged that the "American girl" is the girl of the period. What she may become in the future nobody can tell. At present her destiny seems superb. Her father finds silver, strikes oil, kills pigs by the million, and raises corn by the square mile. She is pretty, can talk well, does not know what deference means, and enters Europe full of money. "If he but shake a traveling cloak, Down our Appian roll the scudi," said Mrs. Browning's Roman of John Bull. It is still truer of the little girl whom Uncle Sam does his best to spoil by unlimited tenderness and innumerable cheques. As a result of her beauty, her smartness, or her wealth—sometimes all combined—she has French nobles, Italian princes, and English dukes at her feet, and can capture coronets at her will. Sometimes as Henry James and Mr. Howells point out, she is not so eager for these ornaments as might be expected. For the truth must be told—marriage does not seem to the fair American what it still means to the majority of English women. Whether we call it a virtue or a fault, she can do without it. French women, their countrymen say, are not blameless as wives, but perfect as mothers. Young American ladies of culture do not greatly desire, it is said, either to be wives or mothers. It is well, then, that they should come to English soil to find for themselves the attractiveness of English nurseries and homes. They will learn here that no queen in society has so true a throne as the wife and mother who mixes love with rule; and even is in future years the slender Yankee belle is hidden behind the ampler beauty of the English matron, we still hear from her lips the wit and shrewdness, the acute accent, the intelligent questions, and the rapid repartee that proclaim her original nationality.—London Telegraph.

A Strange Hallucination.

A panic recently occurred at Shanghai in connection with the building of the cathedral. The idea got abroad that the municipal council wanted a certain number of human bodies to bury beneath the foundation of that edifice; a general dread of venturing out after nightfall—especially of going past the cathedral compound—prevailed for weeks with all kinds of variations and details. A similar notion was said to be at the bottom of the riots which broke out last autumn at Seul. Foreigners—the missionaries for choice—were accused of wanting children for some mysterious purpose, and the mob seized and decapitated in the public streets nine Corean officials who were said to have been parties to kidnaping victims to supply the want. This, however, seems more akin to the curious desire for infantile victim which was charged against missionaries in the famous Honan proclamation that preceded the Tientsin massacre, and which was one of the items in the indictment against the Roman catholics on the occasion of that outbreak. Sometimes children's brains are wanted for medicine, sometimes their eyes are wanted to compound material for photography.—St. James Gazette.

HOUSEHOLD.

A Few Hints.

When hot fat is spilled on floor or table, pour cold water on it immediately to prevent it striking into the boards. What does strike in can be removed by scrubbing with strong hot soda.

It is not known that repeated applications of water (as hot as can be borne) will drive away a ring-a-round or ordinary boil, though the swelling, which is nature's method for purifying the blood, is quite likely to come in some other part of the body.

An excellent remedy for a cough is a simple flax-seed tea, made as follows: Pour over an ounce of whole flax seed a pint of boiling water; let the tea stand on the back of the stove for twenty minutes, then strain and add the juice of three lemons and honey and loaf sugar to sweeten.

When you put a kerosene lamp in your cellar to warm it, set a joint of stovepipe over it and lay a tin plate or the like over the upper end, taking care not to have it tight enough to interfere with the draught. The pipe will be hot as long as the lamp burns, radiating the heat in all directions; while an open lamp merely sends a hot current upward, leaving the bottom of the cellar cold as ever.

Care of the Hands.

All sorts of housekeeping gloves now come for the hands—chamois gloves for dusting, etc.; rubber gloves for wet work, and even cooking gloves—so that there is no need that woman should spoil her pretty fingers. To keep the hands soft and white, or to get them so, dry them with oatmeal and then a rough towel, and occasionally add a little almond paste, which can be procured at any drug store. It is not well to plunge the hands into either very cold or very hot water. For stains caused by ink, paint or other similar substances, one of the best treatments is to put a few drops of oil of vitrol in the water and wash the hands without soap. For any lighter stains vaseline is excellent.

The Women of Great Britain.

There are 3,000,000 more women in Great Britain than men. Thirty-seven per cent. of all the women of marringeable age in England are unmarried. Fully one-half of the women of the educated middle-class—gentlewomen—of marringeable age are without husbands. Economy is the watchword of the day abroad. British fortunes are shrinking. Ways and means of contracting expenditure are every-day topics in British papers. Estates will no longer stand the charges upon them involved in the maintenance of such a horde of maiden sisters. Women unused to lifting a finger for themselves are being thrown in ever-increasing numbers on their own resources. They have been brought up to no renumerative occupation. They have no business ideas. They have no business experience. They shrink with a painful sensitiveness from contact with a rough and tumble world. There are thousands on thousands of them.

Baby Darling.

Hush! don't make a noise and wake the baby. But a noise that does not wake it, may disturb and render its sleep unrefreshing. When a child is sleeping, noise and light ought to be excluded. Carelessness in the matter may so excite the nervous sensibilities as to leave an infant liable to convulsions from any slight accidental cause. Or, as a consequence, a mother may by and by be wondering how it happens that the child is "a bundle of nerves."

And pray be especially careful of baby's eyes. A southern exposure is best for the nursery; but sunshine and strong light, whether natural or artificial, are perilous to new eyes, with their imperfect vision and delicacy. The effect of such imprudence is, in many cases, not apparent for some time, but none the less certain is it that helpless ones have, in a single day, had thus laid upon them the burden of a lifetime. It is said that the eye of a child does not attain full development under eight years.

Coughing in Church.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

The London Lancet says coughing in church to a great extent bred of habit, and "even where a basis of disease underlies the explosion a little self-control could easily do something to lessen its force and its frequency. The cough with many people is an expression of embarrassment, and an unpleasant announcement from the pulpit, such as the contemplated passing around of the contribution basket, is likely to start an epidemic that rapidly spreads throughout the whole congregation. Frequently the fault lies with the sexton. He will open windows and doors and cause cold drafts, and the people, as soon as they are sensible of them, will whisper to next neighbors or to themselves that they are taking their "death of cold," and they will set to barking at a terrible rate to give emphasis to their forebodings. The attentive sexton will next visit the furnace in the basement, and in his stoking operations will set free and send into the audience room volumes of foul gases or irritating dust, announced by volleys of coughs and sneezes. Certainly as the Lancet suggests, people should restrain themselves to a prudent extent when sneezing is in the air, and they notice a coughing storm coming on; and yet there are to be some judgment and discrimination used in this affair. Often a restrained cough, as the saying is, "dies a bornin'," but on the other hand a suppressed sneeze, that might be moderately mild under loose rein, gathers vigor and fierceness in its pent-up quarters, and finally bursts forth with a mighty roar that shakes the house and disturbs the service.

It Was His Own Child.

My name is Anthony Hunt. I am a drover, and live miles and miles away upon the western prairie. There wasn't a house in sight when I first moved there, my wife and I, and now we have not many neighbors, though those we have are good ones. One day, about ten years ago, I went away from home to sell my fifty head of cattle—fine creatures as I ever saw. I was to buy some groceries and dry goods before I came back, and, above all, a doll for my youngest—Dolly. She had never had a store doll of her own—only rag babies her mother had made her.

Dolly could talk nothing else, and went down to the very gate to call after me to get a big one. Nobody but a parent can understand how, full my mind was of that toy, and how, when the cattle were sold, the first thing I hurried off to buy was Dolly's doll. I found a large one, with eyes that would open and shut when you pulled a wire, and had it wrapped up in paper and tucked it under my arm, while I had the parcels of calico and delaine and tea and sugar put up, Then late as it was, I started home. It might have been more prudent to stay until morning, but I felt anxious to get back, and eager to hear Dolly's praises about her doll.

I was mounted on a steady-going old horse and pretty well loaded. Night set in before I was a mile from town, and settled down as dark as pitch while I was in the darkest bit of road I know of. I could have felt my way, though, I remembered it so well; and then the storm that had been brewing broke, and pelted the rain in torrents, I was five miles or may be six miles from home.

I rode as fast as I could, but all of a sudden I heard a little cry like a child's voice. I stopped short and listened—I heard it again—I called and it answered me. I couldn't see a thing. All was as dark as pitch. I got down and felt around in the grass—called again, and again was answered. Then I began to wonder. I'm not timid, but I was known to be a drover and to have money about me. It might be a trap to catch me unawares and rob and murder me. I am not superstitious—not very; but how could a real child be out on the prairie in such a night at such an hour? It might be more than human. The bit of coward that hides itself in most men showed itself to me then; but once more I heard the cry, and said I:

"If any man's child is hereabouts, Anthony Hunt is not the man to let it die."

I searched again. At last I bethought me of the hollow under the hill and groped that way. Sure enough, I found the little dripping thing, that moaned and sobbed as I took it in my arms. I called to my horse, and the beast came to me, and I mounted and tucked the little soaked thing under my coat as well as I could, promising to take it home to mamma. It seemed so tired, and pretty soon cried itself to sleep on my bosom. It had slept there over an hour when I saw my own windows. There were lights in them, and I supposed my wife had lit them for my sake; but when I got into the doorway I saw something was the matter, and stood still with a dread fear of heart five minutes before I could lift the latch. At last I did it, and saw the room full of neighbors, and my wife amid them weeping.

When she saw me she hid her face.

"Oh, don't tell him," she said, "it will kill him."

"What is it, neighbors?" I cried.

"Nothing now, I hope—what's that you have in your arms?"

"A poor lost child," said I; "I found it on the road. Take it, will you? I've turned faint." And I lifted the sleeping thing and saw the face of my own child, my Dolly.

It was my own darling, and none other, that I had picked up on the drenched road. My little child had wandered out to meet papa and the doll, while the mother was at work, and they were lamenting her as one dead. I thanked heaven on my knees before them. It is not much of a story, neighbors, but I think of it often in the nights, and wonder how I could bear to live now if I had not stopped when I heard the cry for help upon the road, hardly louder than a squirrel's chirup. That's Dolly, yonder with her mother in the meadow, a girl worth saving—I think (but then I'm her father, and partial, may be) the prettiest and sweetest thing this side of the Mississippi.—San Francisco Call.

A Girl at the Plow.

There is living in the southern portion of Baldwin county a widow lady who is the mother of seven daughters but has no son. She owns some land, upon which she and her daughters manage to raise a small crop. Last year one of the daughters went to the woods with an ax and cut out and made a plow-stock, fastened on a plow, and with a little steer plowed the entire crop, making seven bales of cotton and a considerable amount of vegetables.—Savannah News.

Going the Rounds.

From the Epoch

"There, my daughter," said the old man, as he took a torn-looking check from his pocket book, "there is my wedding present—a check for $200,000. God bless you!"

"Oh, thank you, papa; you are very kind and generous (examining the check); but isn't this the same check you gave sister Ella when she was married?"

If what a physician declares is true, that more wrinkles come from laughing than from worrying, then we are tempted to say, good luck to the wrinkles. But, alas! we are becoming sceptical in regard to what physicians say, and until more convincing proof is brought forward, the wrinkles will kindly hold off as long as possible.

IN BOHEMIA.

BY LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.

I came between the glad green hills
  Whereon the summer sunshine lay
And all the world was young that day.
  As when the spring's so't laughter thrills
The pulses of the waking May;
  You were alive; yet scare I knew
The world was glad because of you.

I came between the sad green hills,
  Whereon the summer twilight lay,
And all the world was old that day,
  And hoary age forgets the thrills
That woke the pulses of the May;
  And you were dead—how well I knew
The world was sad because of you.

Lost in Mammoth Cave.

To be lost anywhere, and under any circumstances, is an unenviable sensation, but to be lost in a subterranean cavern seventy feet in depth, with fourteen miles of impenetrable blackness ahead of one, comprehends a degree of terror calculated to freeze the blood in the veins.

A merry party of twelve entered Mammoth Cave, determined to see all of its weird and wonderful attractions. Like the "wise virgins" we had our lamps trimmed and burning. After advancing some distance in the gloom, picking our way along the narrow path which shelved over an abyss, the guide said, "if you want to experience a queer sensation just put out your lights for a moment, but take care to know where to find your matches.

The lights were extinguished and in the silence and gloom of these few minutes we could hear the beating of our hearts as distinctly as the ticking of a clock. Relighting the lamps we marched forward in single file, when a gentleman of the party becoming detached from the others determined to try the experiment of again extinguishing his light in order to hear his heart beat. He did so and remained behind while the party went ahead some distance, thinking it would be an easy matter to follow. He then attempted to relight his lamp; match after match was struck but the lamp only emitted a sickly flame for a second and then died out. He held his last match in his hand, carefully pulled the wick, shook the lamp and with a prayer struck the match and held it to the wick. It blazed up for a moment sufficiently for him to see the danger of his attempting to take a step without a light, and then went out. By this time the lights of the party had disappeared and were hidden from view by the gigantic figures which stood like mocking spectres barring his way. His hallo was only answered by the hollow echo of the cavern. He thought of the terrible stories he had heard of persons who had been lost in the cave, of the man who was lost for three hours and when found was a raving maniac, of the lady who became separated from her party and when discovered it was found that in two hours of agonizing suspense her hair had turned as white as snow. All these passed through his mind in as rapid succession as the events of a life pass through the mind of a drowning man. He prostrated himself upon the ground and attempted to crawl along the pathway, and as the earth and the pebbles tumbled into the river Styx, flowing at the base of the mighty chasm, they seemed to presage his awful doom. The cold sweat stood in great beads upon his hands and forehead, minutes seemed hours. Again he uttered the cry of "lost! lost!" but only a mocking echo came back in return. The cave seemed haunted with demons, each trying to pull him down into the fathomless stream below, where he would become the companion of the eyeless fish and the hundreds of strange creatures that peopled those inky waters. Another cry! and then the faint glimmer of a light was seen. Nearer and nearer it came and louder and louder sounded the call for help. Perhaps, thought he, that light comes from the fiery eyes of one of those monsters that inhabit subterranean abodes, and I shall be food for him; but soon the echo of a human voice was heard. Hope sprung in his heart, and the welcome form of one of the guides appeared. Weak from exhaustion he raised himself, saying "how many hours have I been here?" The guide consulted his watch and found that just twelve minutes had elapsed since he became separated from the party.

"Twelve minutes!" said he. "Impossible, it seems a lifetime. In those twelve minutes, I have suffered the tortures of the damned. I have been dashed to pieces by the roaring cataract, devoured by wild beasts, become a raving maniac, and had my hair bleached to snowy whiteness."

When he rejoined our party he looked as if he had passed through a severe spell of sickness, and to this day he says that the memory of that dreadful occurrence haunts him like a terrible nightmare.

Her Appetite Her Only Fault.

"She's a good girl, but I can't keep her. She eats too much," said a lady in an up town intelligence office.

"She is neat and tidy, and does her work well, but I had rather pay her a whole month's wages, although she has only worked a week, than to feed her until her time is up. She eats three pounds of steak, four potatoes and half a dozen slices of bread for her breakfast, and an ordinary dinner for her would feed a starving family for a week."

The girl in question was a small English maiden, recently landed, and was steady and industrious in every way, but had such a tremendous appetite that she never remained more than a week in a place. The matron at the office said that American girls have good appetites, but they cannot compare with foreign help when there is any eating to be done.

They eat as though they wish to make up for the generations their ancestors have been starving in the old country. A great many families hire help by the day to wash and iron, and do the remainder of the housework themselves, because they cannot afford to pay a girl wages and board her also. The grocers' and butchers' bills for a married couple who employ one servant are double what they would be without the servant.—Mail and Express.

To Secure Married Happiness.

The solution is simple. This is to be done by not trusting to the love to take care of the marriage, but by using the marriage to take care of the love. This is a point that few turn over in their minds. It is well worth brooding over. The secret of happiness is in it. Young couples marry for love. Then they say, each in his or her heart, "Now we are safe; the reefs are passed, we love each other and are married; all is done; our happiness is made; love takes care of that; we will ride at rest in the harbor."

Fatal error! Love itself must be taken care of. It belongs to the class of fine things that will not thrive without exceeding care; only weeds grow without looking after. This is the best definition of a weed—a plant that thrives on neglect. Weeds have been defined poetically as plants of which we know not yet the use. Ah! But let a use be found, and instantly we shall need to improve the plant. Then there is a tussle with it; and then it is not a weed. What if one set out a rare rose bush in a bed, and say. "There, now grow," but never tend it, dig about it, shade it? Yet just so many unthinking young couples plant love in marriage, and say, "There, bloom now!" and go about their business; and their plant of Paradise becomes dried up and eaten of canker worms. Tis done before they know it. They discover it when they go for a flower and find none.

Therefore we repeat, Trust not to love to take care of the marriage; it is the business of the marriage to look after the love. This must be done as one takes care of anything else, by forethought and invention. They must plan for it, be ingenious for it. Let the wife consider in the morning: "How can I send my husband off for the day with a bit of attention that will cling to his heart till he comes back to me?" Let the husband ask himself: "What can I invent now that will show my wife that I've had thoughts of her in the midst of business cares?"

Let each do that frequently, and give mind to it, and say: "I must take care of that love; it is too costly a bloom to let droop." Our word for it, that is a kind of inventiveness in which every one will succeed who will give mind to it.—Detroit Free Press.

"Love Your Enemies."

When the Eighth Vermont regiment was in Lousiana one of the officers was taken very ill, and left in charge of a picket post. A woman living near by urged him to come to her house, as the climate was malarious. He declined her hospitality, but before long became so much worse that his companions carried him to the house in almost a dying condition.

Mrs. Sparks—this was the good woman's name—preceived his almost desperate case, but had no medicines nor could any be procured nearer than New Orleans, ten miles away. What could she do for this enemy? Her husband was infirm, and the few negroes who remained to her were old and decrepit.

Moreover, it was late in the afternoon, and rain was falling heavily; but something she must do, even though the sick man was in arms against her government.

She sent one of her servants to the house of a neighbor, five miles distance, and this woman, a violent secessionist, went herself to New Orleans, through a drenching rain, for the medicine. She traveled fifteen miles in the storm and darkness, and crossed the Mississippi river twice, and all to save the life of an enemy. The officer remained in the house for six weeks, and was cared for most assiduously. Such deeds are worth recounting; they go far to redeem the horrors of war.—Youth's Companion.

Simple Rules of Etiquette.

1. Don't repeat the scandals of the day. They are old. Invent new ones.

2. Never be witty at the expense of another. He may command a larger credit than yourself,

3. Don't lounge in company. If you must at all, lounge on the chairs or sofa.

4. A boy should always tip his hat when meeting older persons or a gust of wind.

5. Let ladies pass through a door first. It may be slippery, so you had better wait and see.

6. Eat as fast and as slow as the rest. As fast to get your share. For the same reason as slow, not to encourage any possible superior into a contest.

7. Finish the course with the others. You cannot well do otherwise, for after they have finished it how can you continue?

8. Cover the mouth with the hand or napkin (both if nature has made it necessary) while removing anything from it, as the hand.

9. A gentleman usually vacates his seat for a lady, if he sees a better one unoccupied. This, however, is not always necessary if the lady is his "best girl" and no one else is present.

10. Never leave home with unkind words on your lips. Stay till you have said them.

11. The etiquette of calls depends a good deal on whether you are calling on the minister or calling the cows.—New York World.

The Hungry Veil.

From the Baltimore Sun.

One of the laughable results to which the followers of the present fashion of wearing the Hading veils most often wearing Hading veils must often complain, is their inability to take any refreshments at afternoon teas. It is so much trouble to untie the ribbon tapes that hold the veil in place under the chin that it is rarely ever attempted, and consequently they are obliged to remain outside the dining-room. Somebody has aptly renamed this voluminous face covering the "hungry veil."

SALZER'S IRONCLAD 640 BUSHELS PER ACRE

What the Sea Cast Up.

BY ARTHUR L. MESERVE.

It was a bleak December night, and and a great gale was abroad over sea and land.

Huge waves threw themselves with mighty force against the great jagged cliffs as though they would force them from their foundations, as for ages they had been trying to do.

On the land the wind had better success. Great trees were uprooted, and the air was filled with flying branches wrenched off and carried along on the blasts as though they had been wisps of straw.

I twas a night long after remembered by the people a long the coast and spoken of as the great storm.

That night in an old, large, rambling house some half a mile from the shore, two people were seated on the hearth, listening apparently to the warning of the elements without, for some time had elapsed since a word had passed the lips of either.

The house seemed somewhat unstable, and with every blast it shook and trembled as though it were about to come tumbling down about the heads of its occupants.

Strange and uncanny sounds were heard coming from the room in other parts of the building, as though unseen guests were holding high revel there.

The fire on the hearth burned fitful. Sometimes it would leap high up the broad open fireplace as if it would escape on the wings of the wind, and then it would fall down and well-nigh disappear, save the bed of glowing embers scattered over the hearth.

The pranks of the fire sent strange and grotesque shadows dancing upon the wall, taking all manner of uncouth shapes as though they were holding high carnival

The two figures before the fire sat speechless and without motion. They saw not the strange pranks and the liberty the firelight was taking with them on the wall. To all appearances they were utterly unconscious of anything which was passing in the room and unmindful of the warfare without.

One was an old man, gray and bent with years. His hands clutched a long staff which he had planted on the hearth, and his eyes wide open, were fixed on the glowing embers as though he saw something which fascinated him among them. His face was almost bloodless and as white as the long thin hair which fell upon his shoulders.

His companion was a girl of not more than twenty years even if she had seen as many. She was beautiful as it was, but she would have been far more so had it not been for a tired, weary look upon her face. It was a discouraged look, as if all the hopes of her life had fled away forever, and what she saw before her was only a dismal blank.

"Nellie," said the old man, at length, but at that moment such a blast struck the house that it would have drowned a much stronger voice than that of her companion.

"Nellie," repeated the old man in a louder key, "don't you hear me?"

"Did you speak before, grandfather?" said the girl, looking up into his face.

"Yes," said the old man, querulously. "But you were thinking of something or somebody besides me. It is always so when I speak. I might as well be all alone."

"I did not hear you, grandfather. The wind is blowing such a gale that it is no wonder. What is it I can do for you?"

"Nothing, nothing," replied the old man, testily.

"Yes, there was, grandfather," said the girl, laying her hand on the old man's knee. "Tell me what it was. You were at least thinking of something. But listen a moment. Did you ever know a harder gale than this?"

Again the old house rattled, and creaked, and groaned. The wind whispered if possible more like a fiend than before, and above all was the roar of the ocean as if enraged to think that it could not engulf the land and sweep everything before it.

"I've known many a bad night since this roof has covered my head; nights in which it seemed that the waves would wash the old house from its foundation. Alack, it is a pity that it did not. I would rather that it would have chanced to do so, than to have lived so long, and then to be turned out of it in my old age by Simon Grover. But it is to be, and we have only a week for it to shelter us. Could I but have my wish the storm would lay it low to-night, and fill up the field and meadow so that it would only be an expanse of drifting sand."

"Do not talk in this way, grandfather. You shall not come to want. You know that I have got strong hands and am willing to work. We will find a little cottage somewhere hereabouts, where I can get work to do at home, and we shall be happier than we have been here for many a year."

There was a pained and bitter look upon the face of the old man. It was evident that the words of the girl had brought no comfort to his heart.

"A curse be upon the head of Simon Grover!" he cried. "If it were not for him I should not be turned out of my home in my old age like a dog. You know that I always thought that it was he who stole my strong box, when I was so sick as not to know what was passing about me. He sat up with me one night, they said, and it must be then that it went, although it was not missed until days afterwards when I had come to myself. He stole it, the miserable thief, and with it went all my papers that showed my title to this house and lands which I had from his father. They had never been put on record, as they should have been, and the lawyer who drew them, and the witnesses, are dead. Dead, all of them. All this time he has let us stay here for an evil purpose of his own. He has seen you grow up into a beautiful woman and he has meant to have you for a wife. But, my girl, you have your grandfather's spirit. Better that we should beg from door to door than that you should consent to his wishes."

The girl shuddered.

"I could not do it, grandfather, even for your sake. It would be a living death to me. I can work my fingers to the bone, but to be tied to that man would be horrible."

"You shall not my child. I would not have you comply with his wishes for what little of life that is left to me. Still I can't help thinking and speak- of it sometimes, and when there is such a night as this, the impulse to do so is more than I can understand, but we will say no more about it to-night. Let us try and talk of something more cheerful."

And then Nellie, humoring his whim, did her best to lead his thoughts in another direction. It was a hard task, as the firelight showed when it illuminated her face; but the old man did not see the look of pain thereon and how bravely she bore up trying to carry the burden that had been imposed upon her young shoulders.

The hour for retiring came at last, and after she had seen him comfortably tucked up for the night, she went into her own room. But it was a long time before sleep came to her eyes. The house again and again shook beneath the fury of the blast as though it meant to level it to the earth. But it was not this nor the roar of the ocean that kept her awake. It was the thought of her grandfather, and what she was to do when Simon Grover turned them out from beneath the roof that had sheltered her ever since her eyes had first seen the light of day.

But at last she slept, and when she awoke, the low, slanting rays of the sun, as it arose from its ocean bed, shone in through the window. The storm had ended during the night, and the only sound that met her ears was the still angry roar of the ocean as it dashed upon the jagged coast as if loath to give up the assault it had so fiercely made upon it.

She gave a weary sigh as she thought of the long day before her, and the future that stretched out so blank and dreary before her. Then she arose and dressed herself, for she heard her grandfather in the outer apartment. Soon after she joined him with a smile upon her face, and she was glad to perceive that his despondent mood of the night before had disappeared.

About ten o'clock that forenoon as her grandfather was sitting outside the door he called to her.

"What is it?" she said, coming out to the spot where he was seated.

"There is a man coming up the road yonder. Can you tell me who it is? Your eyes are sharper than mine."

"That is Simon Grover, grandfather."

"That is who I thought it was. He is coming to harass me again to-day. Oh, the viper. How I wish that I could crush him beneath my foot. But alas, it is he who can do the grinding now."

"Let him do his worst, grandfather. We know what that is and we can meet it. I don't want to see or speak to the villain again, so if you are willing I will go down to the beach and wait until he has gone. I can go down back of the house and he won't see me if I go at once. From where he is now his view is cut off."

"Go at once, Nellie. It is enough for one of us to have to see him."

"I will be back as soon as he is gone, grandfather. I shall know when he goes, as I can see the road from where I shall be among the rocks."

With these words and a kiss on the old man's cheek, she ran through the house and out of the rear door and took her way to the rocks with the speed of a deer.

Once arrived there, and concealed among them, she cast a backward glance toward the house.

She saw that Simon Grover had arrived there and was standing beside her grandfather. She suspected that high words might be even then passing between them, and she felt thankful that she was not there to hear them. Her grandfather, she knew, was amply able to make reply to the man she so detested, and there was little need of her being there to help him.

She took a seat on a low rock a little back from the water's edge and gazed out on the troubled waters of the great deep, which had not yet recovered from its encounter with its old enemy the wind. The waves came rushing in as they had done the previous day but they were not so large and violent as they had been, for now, between the rocks and the farthest point of their advance, there was a narrow strip of white sand which lay drying in the sun's rays.

From the wide ocean before her, her gaze came back to this little strip of sand, and, half imbedded in it, she saw an object which at once riveted her attention.

It looked like a small wooden box, almost stained black by the water, and bound about by a couple of rusty iron bands.

Evidently it had been thrown up from the bed of the ocean by the storm just over.

Her curiosity was aroused by the sight and she looked about her to find some spot where she could descend to where it was lying.

This she soon found, and in a few moments was standing beside it on the sand.

The lower portion of the box was but loosely buried in the sand, and freeing it, she raised it in her hand.

It was heavier than she had thought it would prove, but she carried it up over the rocks and was on the point of laying it down, so that she could examine it, when, glancing up toward the road, she saw Simon Grover going in the direction of home at a pace which showed that he was thoroughly angry.

She knew that her grandfather would need her now, and so with her burden clasped in her arms she at once made her way towards the house.

She found her grandfather walking back and forth before the door, his face flushed as though his interview with Simon Grover had been anything but pleasant.

"See, grandfather, what I have found on the seashore. What do you suppose there is in it?"

The old man started as though his eyes were coming out of his head, and shook in every limb.

"It's my box," he cried, as soon as he could find his tongue. "Oh, Nellie, where did you find it?"

"On the sand, grandfather. The storm last night must have cast it up. But are you sure it is yours—the one your papers were in?"

"Of course I am, child. It is the very box, sent back to me by Heaven's mercy. Simon Grover, you have lost the game you thought you won when you stole this and threw it into the sea."

It was no small job to force open the box, but at last it was accomplished. Therein was a package of papers stained by water, but considerably well wrapped in oiled silk. Not a paper was missing, and the box contained beside quite a sum in gold.

The day on which Simon Grover ame to take possession of the premses was a day of triumph for the old man and his granddaughter. A lawyer had been sent for, and their enemy brought one with him. It took the two limbs of the law but a few moments to see how matters stood with Simon Grover, and at a whisper from his lawyer he departed, never to set foot in the old house again.—Yankee Blade.

The Bride's Outfit.

I remember the time when no farmer's daughter in the Mohawk Valley was allowed to leave her father's home for another without her dozen of sheets, pillow-cases, table-cloths, towels, etc., and a goodly supply of bedding, feather bed and pillows. To these was added a cow, and sometimes also a horse and a few sheep. Of course it often required some forethought and good management when the family was large and the farm small, but it was no little pleasure in such cases for the girls, as fast as they advanced to a marriageable age, to appropriate a calf or some motherless lambs, and by care and coddling raise them in readiness for the possible event of their marriage. Likewise did they have their pluckings from the geese to make feather beds and pillows, and the quilting-frame and spinning-wheels helped them to the rest. These were truly homely preparations, but in a sense that is of far better significance than ordinary bric-a-brac and embroidery, which constitutes chiefly a bride's belonging to these days. I dare say that not many months elapse before most young housekeepers wish their finery, which was thought so important at the time of the wedding, could be transformed into blankets or some other useful articles. In a home there must always appear a complete background of the necessaries to make ornaments show to advantage; and where provision is not first made for the must-haves, there is a small chance of their receiving proper attention.—American Farmer.

Counting the Motes in the Sunbeam.

Counting the dancing motes in a bar of sunlight sounds like one of those hopeless, never-ending tasks with which malignant fairies delight to break the spirit of little heroines in the German folk stories. Something more than this, however, has been achieved by modern science, which is now able to count the particles floating in any given portion of the atmosphere, and determine what proportion of these are dangerous germs and what are mere dust. Dr. Frankland's curious experiments have shown us how to count the micro-organisms, and now Aitken, of Falkirk, by a totally different method, has been enable to take stock of the more harmless but hardly less interesting dust motes. Thirty-thousand such particles have been detected by him in the thousandth of a cubic inch of the air of a room. In the outside atmosphere in dry weather, the same measurement of air yielded 2,119, whereas after a heavy rainfall the number was only 521. That this power of prying into atmospheric secrets will eventually yield very important results must be obvious to all. Among the most curious discoveries already made is the direct relation between dust-particles and fog, mist and rain.

He Brought Back the Candle.

Cincinnati has the champion absent-minded man. A gentleman living in the suburbs went in a store on Walnut Street to make a few purchases. The only light in the store was a candle standing on the counter near the money drawer. After making his purchases he handed the proprietor a bill, and, after returning him the change, the proprietor walked to the rear of the store to arrange something, when suddenly he was left in the dark. He started toward the counter, and, groping round on it, found, not the candle, but the change. It struck him then that probably the man, in a fit of absent mindedness, had taken the candle instead of his change. He started out after him, and catching up with him, he saw that he had the bundle in one hand and the candle in the other. After apologizing for the mistake the stranger took his change and gave back the candle.

Signs of the Millennium.

From the New York Sun.

In eleven years from this time we shall be living in the twentieth century of the Christian era. Some of the Christian interpreters of the Biblical prophecies have tried to prove by them that the millennium would dawn in the twentieth century, and that mankind would then enter upon the enjoyment of a thousand years of universal peace and happiness. It may be so, though the signs of it are not yet obvious to the unprophetic eye.

THE DIVINE LULLABY.

I hear Thy voice, dear Lord,
I hear it by the stormy sea
When winter's nights are black and wild;
And when affright I call to Thee
It calms my fear and whispers me,
"Sleep well, my child."

I hear Thy voice, dear Lord,
In singing winds, in falling snow.
The curfew chime, the midnight bell,
"Sleep well, my child," it murmurs low,
"The guardian angels come and go,
Oh, child, sleep well!"

I hear Thy voice, dear Lord;
Ay, though the singing winds be stilled
Though hushed the tumult of the deep,
My fainting heart with anguished chilled
By Thy assuring tone is thrilled—
"Fear not, and sleep!"

Speak on—speak on, dear Lord!
And when the last dread night is near
With doubts and fears and terrors wild,
Oh, let my soul expiring hear
Only these words of heavenly cheer,
"Sleep well, my child!"

The Senator's Story.

A Easty Speech for Which He Dearly Paid.

"Well," said the Senator, as he selected a fresh cigar and reached over for a match, "you may not think it, but I came mighty near being hung once."

The whole party stared. Any one less likely to be accused of serious crime than our host—a distinguished lawyer and State Senator of California—it would have been hard to imagine.

"How was that?" I asked."

"When I was a young chap I got my sheepskin from Darmouth, and as I had a few dollars, I made my way out of this State. I mined for a while, and then went to Sacramento, where I hung out my shingle and waited for business. It was literally a shingle, too, painted by myself. I soon after met a girl, Polly Sinclair, the daughter of Robert Sinclair, a builder. There were not so many girls there then, and Polly had plenty of fellows after her. But somehow she took a shine to me, poor as I was, and I was as much in love with her as ever a man could be. Her people did not like me, though, naturally enough, too, for I was only a poor struggling lawyer, and they thought Polly could do better. Her brother was specially against me. Poor Bob, perhaps I was to blame most in the matter. Anyway, Polly and I had found out that we cared for each other, and one night, when we were walking together, we met Bob. He began calling me all the names he could think of, and my temper being none of the best, I got mad.

"Polly kept begging me not to quarrel, and at last I turned away, leaving her with him. As I left I said to him that we would meet again, when I would make him explain his words.

"I was so excited that I could not go home, and I walked along the road for, I should think, five miles from the town. Then I turned and walked back, went to my room, and, being tired out, went to sleep.

"In the morning I was waked up by the sheriff, and arrested for murdering Bob. The poor fellow had been found in the street with his head crushed in by a blow from behind, and everything he had with him taken. There were a dozen witnesses to what I had said to him and to the quarrel. No one had seen me during the evening; my boarding-house keeper had not seen me come in, and altogether things looked rather black for me. The only thing in my favor, and that was little enough, was that there was nothing of poor Bob's found in my possession.

"Well, I was locked up in the old jail, and to tell you the truth, I didn't see my way out of the trouble. Every one in town believed me to be guilty, and there was some talk about lynching me out of hand. When I say every one, I must make an exception. Polly, bless her, beleved in me still, although her father was one of the bitterest, naturally enough.

"I had been in jail about ten days, when one day the door of my cell opened, and Polly came in. How she managed to persuade Sheriff Hughes to let her see me, I do not know, but she did somehow.

"I am not going to tell you what sort of a meeting that was; I could not if I would. Of course, I told her I was innocent of poor Bob's death and she sobbed out her belief in me as I held her in my arms. At last she whispered her plan to me. I was to escape, and the dear girl shoved a file into my pocket as she talked.

"No one, she said, in Stockton would ever believe that I was innocent; and if I did not run away I would try to prove my innocence, and if she succeeded we would never marry any one else. Naturally, I said I would stand my trial, as I was innocent; but when Polly pressed me as to how I was to prove this, I did not know. She talked and begged, and at last I consented. So as Sheriff Hughes came back, she had to leave me.

"I did not like the job, but still I worked away with the file, and as the bars were pretty poor stuff, I got one of them out. I crawled through and reached the street, and then made my way along it towards the edge of the town. I was to strike out across the plains, hiding in the day-time and traveling at nights only. I reached the open country, and just about daylight lay down to sleep in a hollow, between two ridges. I could not sleep long however, and after a time I was lying there wide awake. I got so nervous at last that I made up my mind to go on, and started once more. I had not been walking very long, and, as you may suppose, I was taking advantage of every bit of cover that I could get, when I saw a long line of men riding over the plains toward me. With them were any number of dogs, for, although we had no bloodhounds in those days, there were lots of dogs who would bark at a stranger if they saw one.

"Gentlemen, my heart seemed to stand still. Although I didn't want to escape at first, now that I had, it seemed to me doubly bitter to be retaken. I do not know how to explain it to you, but the second capture was far worse than the first. But what could I do? There wasn't a tree for miles—there was no broken ground nor rocks to hide in. Nothing but that wide rolling plain, and that line of men slowly riding towards me. It made me feel sick.

"I took the only chance I had, and lay down in a hollow place where they might overlook me, and so I waited. I could hear the shouts of the men as they came nearer, hear the barking of the dogs, and I could do nothing. I tell you I seemed to fairly melt with perspiration. At last they came quite close. A dog saw me and began to bark. I sprang to my feet, and as I did so a man fired at me and shot me in the shoulder, which is stiff yet. This man was John Bogart, the deputy sheriff. Of course there was no fight—I had nothing to fight with. Sheriff Hughes came up, put me on a horse, and back we went to town. This time I had shackles fastened to my feet. My case was worse than before, because every one was now sure that I had killed poor Bob. I tell you I paid dearly for that hasty speech to him.

"Naturally my capture soon became known, and Polly, as she has told me since, was nearly beside herself at the result. She blamed herself for it all, especially as every one told her that my running away proved my guilt. The poor girl got sick with anxiety and fear, and had to take to her bed.

"Meantime, the time for my trial was coming mighty near, and I do not believe that a juryman could have been found in Sacramento to say that I was not guilty. In fact, any twelve men would have sentenced me without hearing the evidence. My shoulder bothered me not a little, too, and Bogart, the jailer, used to tell me, with a grin, I must get well in time for the 'ceremony,' as he called the hanging. Cheerful, wasn't it?

"One evening, Polly, who was getting a little stronger, was sitting on the porch of their house, when she saw a man walking up the street. She has always said she does not know why she did it, but something made her follow him. She just could not help it. She did follow him down a by-lane, until he reached a hillock of sand just outside of the town. On the further side of this, she saw him dig some things up which he put into his pockets. Then, after filling in the hole, he made his way back, passing close to where the girl was crouching behind a pile of rubbish, so close that she recognized him. She followed him again, and saw him walk toward the jail. Reaching that building, he went into a little house at one side, and Poll crept softly up, and looked through a crack between two of the boards.

"What she saw was enough to make her go to the sheriff's house as fast as she could walk. Hughes had gone to bed, but Polly insisted on his getting up and talking to her. When he heard her story, he put on his hat, went out and got three men he knew, and made his way with them to the house by the jail. Here they walked in, and quietly searched the room.

"I suppose you have guessed what they found. All of poor Bob's things—his watch, his money, a revolver with his name on it, and his pipe, were hidden away under a board in the floor under the bed. It was while they were looking at the things that a step was heard, and the door opened for a second. Before they could jump, the man had turned and run, only to fall into the arms of stout Mike Cassidy, the guard Hughes had left by the door, with orders to let any one in, but no one out; and when they hauled the man back into the room where the light was, Hughes had the pleasure of looking at his own deputy and jail keeper, John Bogart.

"To make a long story short, Bogart was the guilty man, and he took a more prominent part in the 'ceremony' than he had anticipated. As it afterwards turned out he had embezzled some money belonging to the county, and hearing that Bob had several thousand dollars with him which he was taking home, he had stolen up behind him in the street and crushed in his head with an iron bar. He might not have done it had he not heard of the quarrel between Bob and myself. In the morning, when the body was discovered, he had suggested that I was the murderer, and, of course, the suggestion was taken up. He confessed everything before he died.

"The next day Polly insisted on telling me the news, and naturally, she was allowed to. I am not going to say anything about that meeting, but after we had been together an hour Hughes came in, saying he wanted to congratulate me, too. It was not long before I was out on bail, and people could not do enough for me. I got cases as fast as I could take them, and it was not long before I was as prosperous as I had been poor before. As for Polly—why, if you have done smoking, we can join her in the parlor."—Alfred Balch, in N. Y. Ledger.

Sambo's Protest.

Congressman Cox, of New York, who is always full of anecdotes bearing upon the talking of the last census, asks his friends to believe that in the District of Columbia a certain census taker was making his official round, when he came to the house of a wealthy member of congress from New England. The door was opened by a black boy, to whom the white man began:

"What's your name?"

"Sambo, sah, am my Christian name."

"Well, Sambo, is your master a Christian?"

To which Sambo's indignant answer was:

"No, sah, my mahster am a member ob congress, sah."—New York Tribune.

Cool.

In 1863, General Franklin was put in military command of an expedition against Sabine Pass, on the coast of Texas. The expedition was not successful, and the ships returned to New Orleans. On the way thither there was one night a collision between a large sea-going steamer and the light river-boat used for headquarters. What followed is narrated by an officer of General Franklin's staff.

Our side was apparently smashed in. A panic seized the crew; captain, pilot, engineer, hands, all rushed for the steamer. Most of our headquarters company and officers followed the example. I was reading in the cabin. The crash and cries attracted my attention. I went on deck, and tried for a moment to restore order, but in vain. The soldiers on the steamer shouted.

"Come on board! come on board! You're sinking! There's a great hole in your side!"

The waves dashed our little boat against the side of the steamer, and the light planks of the wheel-house was grinding and crashing. I can easily understand how contagious is a panic. It was with a great effort I restrained myself from following the example set me. I knew, however, that my place was with the general, and I went in search of him. He was on the hurricane-deck, seated on the sky-light, quietly smoking a cigar.

"General," said I, "aren't you going to leave her?"

"I don't believe she'll sink," he replied.

"But she is an abandoned ship, sir; every one has left her."

"Have they? are you sure?"

"I'll make sure," I replied; and going to the wheel-house I found it deserted. Then I looked into the engine-room—I remember the engine looked so grim and stiff in its solitude.

When I reported the state of affairs to Franklin he consented to go. We found a quiet place aft, and as the waves tossed our light vessel up to a level with the steamer, he sprung upon her deck. I attempted to follow, but the vessel was not tossed high enough. So I watched my chance, and plunged head-foremost into a port-hole, where friendly hands caught me, and prevented me falling on the deck.

But our little steamer would not sink. Franklin at once ordered out the boats, secured the captain and the crew, and returned on board. The outer shell of the boat was crushed in, and she was leaking badly, but the inner ceiling was unhurt. I think the general never quite forgave me for persuading him to leave her.

The Broncho.

Some years ago I drove up to a stage station in San Pedro Valley, in Arizona, and the Mexican stock tender had had a hard time in rounding up his stage stock. His herd pony had been run until, as he stood there under the shade of a brush corral, covered with foam and dust, with his belly drawn up almost to his spine, and gasping occasionally as though it was his last, I felt sure I should see him die before I left the station. I was afterwards told by the stage boss, in a bluff matter of course way, in answer to my inquiry, that he had "pulled through all right; you can't kill them critters." and now I am perfectly positive that you cannot. As a saddle animal simply the broncho has no superior. The "lope" is a term that should never be applied to the motion in any other breed of horses. I have watched a herd of cow ponies being driven over the prairie where the undulations of the backs in the moving throng were as regular and easy as the rise and fall of the watery wave. The fox-trot, which is the habitual gait of all plainsmen, cow-boys and Indians, is easily cultivated in him, and his light supple frame accomodates itself naturally to the motion. This particular American horse lays claim to another quality, which in my estimation is not least, and that is his wonderful picturesqueness. He graces the Western landscape, not because he reminds us of the equine ideal, but because he comes of the soil, and has borne the heat and burden and the vicissitudes of all that pale of romance which will cling about the Western frontier. As we see him hitched to the plow or the wagon he seems a living protest against utilitarianism; but, unlike his red master, he will not go. He has borne the Moor, the Spanish conqueror, the red Indian, the mountain-man and the vaquero through all the glories of their career; but they will soon be gone, with all there heritage of gallant deeds. The pony must meekly enter the new regime. He must wear the collar of the new civilization and earn his oats by the sweat of his flank. There are no more worlds for him to conquer; now he must till the ground.—The Century.

Artificial Deformity.

From the New York Press.

The great trouble with the man of the present day is his feet. The average complexion is well enough but the average foot is a fright. Almost every man you see has an enormous protuberance on his big toe-joint, buttons, I think they call them, which is far from pleasing to the sight or helpful to the gait. I suppose this is occasioned chiefly by the high heels worn by very young men and very silly women. Nature intended the heel to be flat on the ground, but fashion not only hoists it up an inch or two, but sends it forward toward the middle of the foot. This of course jams the toes into a contracted space, and a growth which, if normal, would be all right, being abnormal seeks room where it most easily can find it, and the consequent is a disfigurement of a very essential and interesting portion of our anatomy.

I have found out a gift for my fair. It is not a ring of gold, nor flowers for her hair, nor pearls for her white neck, but Salvation Oil for her sore throat. She's a singing bird.

The Legislature attempted to make a mountain out of a mole-hill when the House refused to pass Eugene Hay's resolution upon the admission of Dakota, because it contained the clause, "So long denied them by a Democratic congress." Because the House refused to pass the resolution does not alter the facts, and the republicans are not responsible for the blunders of the democratic party. The vote was a close one, however, 41 in favor of dropping the clause to 39 for adopting the resolution entire.

The Duluth & Winnipeg.

If our legislators, who now have under consideration a bill declaring the land grant of the Duluth & Winnipeg road forfeited, have any regard for the welfare of the state they will vote the bill down, and they will pass a bill extending the grant. This measure is not only fraught with the greatest importance to the northwest but to the whole state. The lands in question being inaccessible are now practically valueless and must remain so until the country is opened to settlement by a road. If the state was called upon to give half the lands for the improvement of the balance it would be largely the gainer, but it is only asked for a small fraction, moreover, the land in question has already been once given the D. & W. and in reallity all the state is asked to do is to remove all shadow of doubt upon their title thus permitting the managers of the D. & W. road to complete the line at an early date. Not only is the state the gainer in increased value of its remaining lands but in increased revenue to be derived from the taxes on thousands of dollars worth of property to be there acquired. Very short-sighted indeed will be the legislation that would attempt to hamper the D. & W. or to defeat its building, and we cannot believe that our legislature would permit so great an act of injustice to be done our state. There is no good reason why that grant should not be extended and there is every reason why it should be. The people of the whole state need this road for the benefits it would confer and especially does every farmer in the northwest need it as it means at least five cents per bushel more to him for his wheat. So far as we can find out it is the universal wish of everybody up here to have the D. & W. grant extended and if our representatives in the legislature wish to please their constituents they will do all in their power to assist the D. & W. road.

A LAND BILL.

A Bill Limiting the Claim of the Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad to Ninety thousand Acres of Swamp Lands.

St. Paul Pioneer Press.

A bill, said to be fathered by Senator Whiteman of Duluth, is soon to be introduced in one house or the other of the state legislature, confirming the claim of the Duluth& Winnipeg railroad to 90,000 acres of swamp lands in the northern part of the state. The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railroad and Kindred forces are preparing to defeat the bill.

It is claimed by the Manitoba road that the legislature four years ago granted those 90,000 acres of swamp lands, which is all the swamp land the state has left, to the Brainerd & Northwestern railroad, which is nothing more or less than the Manitoba road under a different name. The claim of the Duluth & Winnipeg road to the lands is based on an enactment of the legislature ten years ago. The Duluth & Iron Range railroad has also claimed the lands by virtue of a grant from the legislature six years ago. All these grants were conditioned upon the building of certain portions of the road within specified time. The dispute was put in shape for the courts a month ago when Gov. McGill issued patents for two sections of the land to the Duluth & Winnipeg, and the Brainerd & Northwestern began suit. Judge Stearns of Duluth recently decided in favor of the Duluth & Winnipeg, and the appeal from his decision is now pending. If the legislature passes the proposed bill regranting to the Duluth & Winnipeg, that will settle it.

Ex-Mayor Austin of Fergus Falls arrived in St. Paul last night. It is said that he is here to help fight the bill. He is president of the Duluth, Fergus Falls & Southern railroad, which has a line surveyed from Fergus Falls, through Perham to Leech Lake, where it will connect with the Brainerd & Northwestern. Mr. Austin denies that he or his corporation is in any way interested in the fight. Perhaps he isn't, but it looks as if he were. He had not been at the Merchants hotel half an hour last nigh before he took Senator Compton, his fellow townsman, by the arm and led him to the elevator. The two were closeted up stairs until after 10 o'clock.

Mr. Austin says he thinks his road will be built this year. He also says with a show of knowingness, that the Brainerd & Northwestern, eighty miles of which has already been laid between Crookston and Fosston, will be completed this year, and that it will be connected with the Manitoba's line to Duluth by a line to be laid from Hinckley to Brainerd. The Manitoba has recently surveyed a line from Duluth to Leech Lake, which will connect with Mr. Austin's road, making an air line from Fergus Falls to Duluth, but this, Mr. Austin thinks will not be built this year.

MILLIONS IN LAND.

The Duluth & Winnipeg Swamp Grant Before a House Committee.

GORDON E. COLE AND W. P. WARNER REPRESENT THE RAILROAD.

What Are Claimed to be the Equities of the Case.

A Boodle Lobby Reported to be Organized Already.

St. Paul Globe.

The committee on public lands of the house held a most important meeting yesterday afternoon, from 3 until 6, on the Lightly bill to forfeit the land grant of the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad company. The meeting was public, and representatives of all the interests involved were invited to be present.

In opening the meeting Chairman Crossfield noted the receipt of petitions from Kittson and Polk Counties protesting against the passage of the forfeiture bill. Gordon E. Cole, as attorney for the Duluth & Winnepeg, then addressed the meeting, first relating the granting by the state in 1875 to the Duluth & Iron Range of swamp lands to the amount of "ten sections per mile for each mile completed; to be selected within ten miles on each side of the road;" and in case sufficient land was not to be found within these limits, the company to have the right to select the balance due it from ungranted swamp lands in St. Louis, Lake and Cook Counties. The company was to complete its road within five years. In 1876 the state extended the time for this completion three years. In 1878 the state granted to the Duluth & Winnipeg such lands as the Duluth & Iron Range might forfeit and an additional grant of ten sections per mile. In 1883 the state reaffirmed the Duluth & Iron Range grant of 1875. Mr. Cole cited these points, and then noted that in the act of 1878 the use of the words "additional time" might be implied to give the Duluth & Winnipeg ten years more than the Iron Range act of 1875, and thus make its grant yet unforfeitable; and he added:

"Under these grants (1878) the Duluth & Winnipeg began its surveys, did certain grading and expended hundreds of thousands of dollars in good faith. But in 1881, owing to the influence of unfriendly legislation, capital which might have been invested in the road was frightened away, and the progress of the road necessarily delayed. As to the charge that the road, after its original survey, changed its line, I may say that this was done with the wise intention of securing a grade of fifteen feet to the mile instead of fifty feet." He pointed out how had kept the road back, but that in 1888, gaining some headway, it had completed twenty miles, and was already entitled to 125,000 acres of the grant. Furthermore, he held that while the granting act of 1878 made a time limit, it contained no provision for the forfeiture of the grant. He considered the case from the point of the equities. The road, if completed, would be 350 miles in length, and throw open a vast and fertile region to markets of easy access. It proposed to traverse a valuable pine, mineral and agricultural region now suffering for lack of rail facilities. The lands concerned in the grant could be of no value to the state for the school fund, since they were without value if railroads did not traverse them. The greatest profit the state could ever desire from them was by making them, through such a grant as this, open to settlement. Besides, the construction of this road meant a new and powerful rival for the Canada Pacific, giving for northwest grain a short and speedy route to the great waterways and the natural channel of trade to Europe. No other road was proposing to open this great valley, and no imperative duty rested upon the legislature to declare these lands forfeited. The case should be left with the courts. In closing, he said with emphasis:

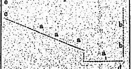
"I am informed that the attempt to hamper and destroy this road is being made by a certain railroad company whose territory is invaded."

Mr. Stone—The Duluth & Iron Range does not recognize that it has forfeited any of its grant and is not interested in this controversy. (To Gen. Cole) Do you refer to the Duluth & Iron Range as trying to injure your road?

Gen. Cole—I do not.

W. P. Warner, of the Duluth & Winnipeg, said that it was clearly the intention of the legislature in the act of 1883 to recognize the Duluth & Iron Range grant and the Duluth & Winnipeg grant as two distinct things, and not involved with each other.



a a—Duluth & Winnipeg.
b b—Duluth & Iron Range.
c—Crookston.
d—Duluth.
e—Winnipeg.

The two grants of ten sections per mile, as seen by this diagram of the relative positions of the two roads, are, on Mr. Warren's construction, distinct and relate to different sections of the country. He held that there was no controversy between the two roads as to their grants. The Duluth & Winnipeg asked for nothing new; simply an affirmation of the old grant. A bill to this effect would soon be presented. It was necessary for the securing of building capital that the title of the road to these grants should be made secure. Nothing was to be gained by forfeiture except the crippling of a great enterprise which promised to be of immense value to the state.

Desultory talk followed, after which the committee adjourned until next Wednesday, when prominent Duluth parties will be heard.

THE LEGAL POSITION of the Duluth & Winnipeg is well stated by Mr. Warner as follows:

"After considering all questions which have occured to me as being material, I am of opinion (1) that the State of Minnesota became the owner of the swamp lands involved on May 12, 1860; (2) that the legislature of that state had, prior to the adoption of the constitutional amendment of Nov. 8, 1881, power to promote construction of railroads by donations of those lands; (3) that upon the passage of the act of March 9, 1878, the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad company became ipso facto vested with a title to the lands referred to in that act, subject, however, to a condition precedent until Feb. 18, 1879; (4) that such title will not become or be divested by failure to build the proposed road within the period limited for so doing by said act; (5) that, if the road be built before such title shall have been divested by judicial or legislative action, the forfeiture incurred by failure to build it within the prescribed period cannot be enforced at all; (6) that the act of March 6, 1883, as well as the one of March 10, 1885, relating to the grant of the Duluth & Iron Range railroad company, do not affect any rights established by the grant of March 9, 1879; (7) that the act of March 10, 1885, in relation to the St. Paul, Brainerd & Northwestern railroad company, is void, and, whether void or not, does not affect any rights established by the grant of March 9, 1878."

Neither Mr. Lightly nor any of the parties alleged to be unfriendly to the road made any statement to the committee yesterday.

TALK OF A LOBBY.

In connection with the bill it is stated that the real opposition to the measure will not come before the committee, but be exerted through a lobby now alleged to be organized with an exchequer containing $15,000, to be used in greasing itching palms. Involving as the grant does the right of way through an incalculably valuable piece of territory, and conflicting as it will with another powerful system, the fight in the house promises to be as lively and notorious as the late senatorial episode. The public lands committee appears to be well satisfied that as far as time limits are concerned that the Duluth & Winnipeg has made its grant liable to forfeiture, but that in equity it may be more just to consider the spirit of the law instead of the exact letter. The entire country north of the Northern Pacific has monetary interest in the defeat of the pending bill that may be expected to counterpose the the alleged golden ducats of the opposition. However it is, all the indications are that the great fight over the bill will be in the lobby.

Duluth & Winnipeg.

Winnipeg Sun.

A Winnipeg gentleman just returned from the south brings the good news that the construction of the Duluth & Winnipeg railway will be proceeded with this year. To the Winnipeg gentleman Mr. Fisher, president of the company, stated that the company had at last succeeded in overcoming the opposition of the St. P. M. & M. in the courts, and had obtained the land grant. For six years, Mr. Jim Hill, president of the St. P. M. & M., and would-be "friend" of Manitoba, had succeeded in obstructing the construction of the Duluth & Winnipeg railway by various means. He has fought them strenuously in the courts and also in the financial markets in New York. When a company of capitalists had been formed to build the railway, then Mr. Hill would threaten to parallel the road and thus balk conconstruction. At last, however, a syndicate of New York and St. Paul capitalists has been formed capable of building the road forthwith. President Fisher is very anxious to get into this country. He says it is a recognized fact that the wheat belt of America is continually moving north.

Grand Forks Daily Herald: Daniel O'Connor, of Crookston, is in town. Daniel bought two lots from Frank Church this morning for $1,000. The lots are situated in proximity to the Manitoba depot, he tells us. Daniel has something else on his mind, tho', paramount to lots—he has discovered a method of making binders out of straw that is destined to revolutionize the twine trade. Those intimately acquainted with Mr. O'Connor are cognizant of the fact that in speaking Dan'l pays no attention to speed—the faster the better. In regard to his invention he briefly remarked—Itellyou, thattheresmillionsinit—I'monmywayto the Minnesota legislature tohavethe thingsanctioned and thenlookoutforsqualls.

Farm Lands.

Northwestern Agriculturist.

An Eastern correspondent asks what The Agriculturist thinks of the prospect of an advance in the price of Minnesota and Dakota farm lands. He is probably a "speculator" with wild land on his hands, which is not paying as good an income as the "Western Mortgages," which some of the Eastern papers are worrying so much about. The Agriculturist belives that the price of good agricultural lands, well located near railroads, will advance steadily during the next five years. There is a good deal of unsettled land yet, and land is more plenty than buyers, but good public lands that can be had free are scarce and are growing scarcer. Emigration does not slacken, and the high price of wheat is attracting attention again to the Northwest, where the farmer gets as liberal a reward and as quick and sure a return as anywhere.

A combination of circumstances has kept Northwestern land low. Low prices of all leading product have ruled for several years. Crops have been only fair. Several severe winters have followed each other. California and the South have consequently "boomed," on the strength of climate mainly. But peeple have learned that man cannot live on climate and flowers, and have also learned that no country has perfect conditions. Advantages are sure to be balanced by disadvantages. It looks very much as if, during the next few years, the Northwest would take its turn at a prosperous period. Its cities have had a marvellous growth, and all its material intrests have grown in a wonderful way, except its agriculture. This, except in the direction of the dairy, has not in most localities kept pace with the rest of the procession.

Probably the most unfortunate condition for the farmers, was the fact that when wheat price went down, and those who could turned attention to cattle, the price of beef began to decline, until in 1885, it reach its lowest ebb. Thus, those who put money into cattle hoping to find a profit in them, which they had failed to find a profit in wheat, were disappointed. Now, with a fair prospect of good prices for grain and higher prices for beef, there is a better feeling, and fewer farms for sale.

The price of land depends on the kind of farmers who occupy it. Its intrinsic value depends on the profit that can be made out of it. If land lies in the neighborhood of thrifty farmers who are making money, it will command a better price than land surrounded by a shiftless lot, who do not succeed because they do not know how to farm. The kind of stock kept on a farm goes a good ways towards deciding the price it will bring in market. If four acres will feed a grade Shorthorn steer which will sell at 6¼ cents per pound, at the St Paul Transfer, and net the owner $55 to $60, they will earn a good interest on $25 per acre and pay taxes; with a scrub steer on the same land, which would not bring over $25 to $30, the price of the land would drop materially from these figures.

Another point, which has more to do with the value of land than is generally supposed, is the distance from the local market and from the large cities which furnish, for the present, the final market for farm products. Every mile grain has to be hauled to reach the local market costs money, and the time spent on the road to town, if the farm is far away, cuts a large figure before the end of the year in the time roll of the farm.

Missing Money

Wabasha Herald.

F. B. Netzer, of Stillwater, filed a suit in the United States circuit court yesterday against the American Express Company, American Surety Company and T. B. Childs its agent. The complainant states that at various times during the last fifteen years he has been employed by the defendant, the American Express Company, as local agent and messenger. Dec. 1, 1888, the company reported that it had lost a money package containing $1,500. It also suspended plaintiff from duty, and shortly after discharged him, expressing to his friends and many other persons a suspicion of the plantiff's guilt. Upon enlisting his services with the defendant in February 1888, as it required, he gave bonds in the sum of $3,000, the American Surety Company for an annual consideration, issuing the bond to the Express Company. After plaintiff's discharge, Childs, as agent for the Surety, persisted in accusing him of stealing the package and made a statement to the effect. The plaintiff charges Childs with taking undue interest in the affair, and working with the express company to lay the guilt upon him, doing what damage either could by inquiries in localities where the plaintiff had a perfect reputation as to honesty and integrity. While the plaintiff was living at the Sawyer House Stillwater, and away on an errand at Minneapolis, the said Childs, under the guise of an officer, entered plaintiff's room, and, advertising his mission to every one with whom he came in contact, proceeded to search the room He informed every-body that he was searching for the stolen package, there by disgracing and dishonoring the plaintiff. Netzer alleges that he knows nothing of the stolen or lost package. He concludes his bill by asking damages in the sum of $25,000 for the loss of reputation and former good name and standing, alleging that he cannot obtain employment by reason of the damaging statements made against him. —Globe.

Mr. Netzer is well known in this city and has always stood high and borne an unblemished reputation. On a mere suspision based upon the slightest of grounds he was branded as a thief, and himself and family subjected to all manner of indignities, the result of which was to establish his innocence beyond a doubt. We wish him the highest success in the action which he has commenced. It is time the fact was established that a man.s character is too sacred a thing to be meddled with on no other grounds than those of suspicion.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON MINN., FEBRUARY 21, 1889.

Proceedings of the Board of County Commissioners.

COUNTY AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
Polk County,
Crookston, Jan. 30th, 1889.

The board met pursuant to adjournment. All members present except Com'r Johnson. The minutes of last meeting were read and approved.

The school petitions of Michael St. Aubin, Peter Bankind et al, M. W. Johnson et al, were rejected.

The s½ sec. 24, town 153, range 47, was attached to school district No. 71.

The official bond of Henry Shepard as coroner was approved.

The school petition of Bernard Rodrique was granted, and his farm, to-wit: Se¼ sec. 15, tp. 150, range 45, was detached from school district No. 20 and attached to school district No. 105.

The school petition of O. Marcil was presented and a hearing set at the next session of the board.

The official bond of C. O. Christianson as judge of probate, was approved.

The sum of $34.80 was ordered refunded the M. & N. Elevator Co. for penalty and costs added to personal tax of 1887, in addition to an abatement previously ordered.

The tax application of Johnson & Stephens was granted and the taxes cancelled.

The tax application of C. O. Lizee was rejected.

The auditor presented the financial statement which was examined and ordered published.

The annual reports of sheriff, clerk of court, register of deeds and superintendent of schools were read and ordered placed on file.

The sum of two thousand dollars was apportioned of the current tax collections (undistributed) and ordered placed at the credit of the county poor fund.

On motion the county auditor was appointed a sub-committee of one for purchasing supplies.

The following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That a resolution adopted by this board in 1888, whereby the county poor funds were separtated into five separate district funds, be and the same is hereby rescinded, and all poor funds collected by the County Treasurer shall be credited to the general county poor fund.

The following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That a resolution adopted by a former board of county commissioners whereby the general county bridge fund was subdivided into five separate district bridge funds, corresponding with each commissioner's district be and the same is hereby resolved annulled and rescinded, and the auditor and treasurer are hereby directed to close said district accounts and credit the general county bridge fund with the amounts found as the credit of said district funds.

Messrs. Hunt and Rinehart were appointed a committee on St. Hilaire bridge repairs, and Messrs. Kirsch and Rinehart a committee to examine the bridge at East Grand Forks, and Crookston township.

The following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That pursuant to a recent act of our state legislature, this board shall issue the bonds of the county of Polk in the sum of twenty thousand dollars for the purpose of funding the floating indebtedness of said county, and be it further

Resolved, That the county auditor be and he is hereby directed to advertise for bids for said issue of bonds. Said bonds to be issued in a series of $1,000 each, bearing interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum.

The school petition of Hugh McDonald was granted, and secs. 4,5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 16, 17, 18, tp. 152, range 48, were detached from school district No. 98, and organized as district No. 30.

The following monthly allowances were made to county paupers:

To Mrs. Runnestad, of Lessor, $8 for two months.

Mrs. B. Peterson, of Winger, $5 for two months.

Tollef Nelson, of Garden, for boarding a pauper child, $8 per month.

Nels Nelson, of Hill River tp., $10 per month.

The tax applications of Jas. Roseau and Oscar H. Olson were granted.

A committee of the whole proceeded to compare the vouchers on file in the auditor's office, and finding same correct, cancelled and destroyed the same.

The following poor aid allowances were made, all in 4th district:

Nels Nelson, $15.00 per month until April 1st, 1889.

Board adjourned sine die.

P. J. MCGUIRE, Co. Auditor.

Farm, Stock and Home: A daily press dispatch says that three large trunk factories in Racine, Wis., have had to close down lately, throwing 300 hands out of work, because of the recent advance in rail rates west of the Missouri river. The factories had large orders from Colorado and the Pacific slope, which they could not fill and pay the present rates of freight. The railroads interested in this latest "protection to American labor," were built by public bounty, and were given land sufficient for half a dozen empires. Their promoters and officers have grown fabulously rich, and their patrons have ever been extorted from. But it's all right; the people are getting at this sort of thing in fine shape. They are sending up to the United States Senate from all parts of the country railroad presidents, makers of ficticious values and partners in trusts and combines, and these men go to the front accompanied by the glad acclaims of a rejoicing people, therefore all must be well, and such must be the right kind of men to send there, for is not "the voice of the people the voice of God."

Comfort on the Farm.

Northwestern Agriculturist.

The mildness of the winter has shown the possibilities of this climate for comfort on the farm. While there have been no storms or severe cold, and nearly every day has been bright, clear and comfortable for out-of-door work, there has been no rain or mud to interfere with such work as it is desirable to do in winter. The clear, bracing, health-giving air is such as few other climates can boast of. A moderate northern winter is beyond comparison the most healthful and the most comfortable known to any climate. A mild winter in this latitude is simply delightful. A severe and stormy one seems long, and continued excessive cold is trying, if exposure to it is necessary, but such winters are trying in any climate, and cause as much grumbling and apparently as much suffering in California or Florida as they do in Maine or Minnesota. No climate is perfect, and those who leave any locality simply to find comfort, will search in vain. There is no valid reason for selling out property and moving from the locality where years of labor have been spent and strong friendship established, except to recover lost health. Few know the value of friends and good name which is earned by every man who lives an honorable life among his neighbors. All this is forfeted in removing to a strange locality, where a new start in life must be taken. The disadvantages of the present home are ever present, and the attractions of some far off place look rosy, but there is no paradise on earth. The nearest to it is a happy and comfortable home, earned by honest effort, and that is within the reach of every industrious farmer in the Northwest who has health. The Northwest is a good place to live. It is progressing rapidly and safely, and next five years are certain to record such marked improvement as will place its agriculture at the front, and advance the value of its fertile lands.

Frosted Wheat for Seed.

Northwestern Agriculturist.

A recent inquiry regarding the value of frosted wheat for seed indicates what may be a common mistake regarding the extent to which the seed influences the plant which it produces. The writer says: "I have tested grain similar to the samples sent, and it has germinated and grown nicely, coming on again after being cut back two and three times; still some maintain it will not mature even if it does germinate." Another correspondent says that he "has been told that plants will grow from frosted wheat, but just about the blossoming time it withers and dies."

As is well known, the seed consists of a tiny plant and nourishment enough to sustain it until in growth it can develop root enough to furnish its own food supply. As a rule, the seed contains more food-material than is just sufficient for its needs, so that if a seed be planted too deep, it can yet live to reach the surface. If, as reported in the above case, the seed germinates, and puts forth roots and green leaves, it is independent of the seed and if it should fail to mature, the cause must be looked for in conditions that have developed after germination. The trouble is that even in fields badly touched with the frost the amount of damage is uneven; many grains of wheat seem to be deprived of all vitality, while others are scarcely harmed. I have noticed, too that many grains that are badly shriveled germinate readily, while at times plump grain refuse to grow—although as a rule the plump grain grows much the best.

These facts point to the conclusion that it is not wise to condemn wheat as useless for seed because it is somewhat shriveled; on the contrary, whenever doubt exists of vitality of seed, a few hundred grains planted in a box and placed in a warm room will give a good idea of the percentage of groth.

In the frosted area much more care than usual should be given to preparation and seeding, so that every condition which the farmer can control will be favorable to germination.

CHAS. A. KEFFER.

Farm, Stock and Home: Colorado has got a new United States Senator. He is now and has been for several years in receipt of an annual salary of $30,000 as the attorney for two railroads, both of which are interested in the advanced rates west of the Missouri, which is noticed in another paragraph in this paper. With the United States Senate filled with bank presidents, owners and attorneys, and with partners in all kinds of capitalistic confederations, there should be no doubt about the interests of the common people being zealously guarded by that body.

A. D. STEPHENS,

Second Street, Crookston, Minn.

M. G. Peterson, of the town of Garden, writes us under date of Feb. 18th, requesting the publication of a letter that he received from Senator Sampson on the clerk of the court bill. As the Senator has been unjustly attacked in the matter, and his motives misconstrued, we gladly publish his statement in relation thereto:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
Senate Chamber,
St. Paul, Feb. 9, 1889.

M. G. PETERSON, ESQ.:

DEAR SIR:—I received yours, dated Feb. 7th, 1889, and also the strong remarks you made against me, which you would not have done if you had not seen the Crookston Times, and you are asking for information relating to the bill I introduced, S. F. No. 86, and about its passage, which I will state. I introduced the bill Jan. 22d, 1889, to repeal Sec. 4, Chapter 254, special laws of 1885, relating to the clerk of the district court only. This bill brings our clerk of court in Polk County on the same footing as other clerks of courts in the state, which I thought was right, and I can't see no reason for saying that I hurried that bill through, as it was nine days in the hands of the lawmakers, as I recollect it, and on Jan. 1st, 1889, had not reached the Governor, so I think that the Crookston Times must have dictated for themselves.

I am not interested in any "woodchuck" or steal, and don't want to be placed before the people in that light. I consider myself as a servant before a mass of people, which I represent, and don't pretend to know the "bottom" of all bills which I receive, but certainly do my best for my constituents and will correct any bill which I find does an injustice to the people. I hope this will give you a fair understanding, and the journal of the senate will testify that I have told you the truth.

Very respectfully yours,
B. SAMPSON.

ARGUING THEIR CLAIMS.

THE DULUTH & WINNIPEG LAND GRANT.

The Legislative Committee on Public Lands Hear the Arguments of Both Sides on the Claim of the Company.

St. Paul Dispatch.

Representative Lightly's bill to declare a forfeiture of the swamp land grant of the Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad company came up again before the committee on public lands yesterday afternoon. There was in attendance a large delegation from the northwestern part of the state, and especially from the upper Red River Valley, and also one from the northeastern part of the state, comprising mostly citizens of Duluth. These delegations came down to protest against the passage of the forfeiture bill. The spokesman of the Red River Valley delegation was Mr. Steenerson, one of the ablest lawyers of that part of the state, residing at Crookston. Mr. Steenerson's position was that the farmers in his section of the country required a shorter and competing route to the lake. He said they were now compelled to pay not less than 10 cents a bushel in order to get their grain to Duluth, notwithstanding the fact that the same grain was carried from Duluth to New York city for 7½ cents; and he said that this state of things would continue until the farmers of that region had an independent competing route to Duluth. In answer to the suggestion that the Manitoba Railroad company proposed to build a line of its own from Crookston to Duluth, Mr. Steenerson's position was that the so doing would afford no relief; that the Manitoba Railway company in that case would continue to charge 10 cents a bushel whether the grain went to Duluth by way of St. Cloud or directly over their proposed new road. Mr. Steenerson further contended that the state's swamp lands in the southern part of the state had been used to promote the building of railroads in the southern part of the state, and that in filling those grants those roads had consumed a large part of the swamp lands in the northern part of the state that ought to have been used solely to aid the construction of railways north of the Northern Pacific road. This, Mr. Steenerson claimed, was unfair towards the northern part of the state. That the effect of it is to leave substantially one-third of the state wholly undeveloped, and to practically shut off the Red River Valley from the lake.

Mr. Steenerson also urged that the proposed forfeiture of the grant to the Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad in 1878 would practically add nothing to the fund set apart by the constitutional amendment of 1881 for the support of the state institutions, because the building of the road would enhance the value of the state swamp lands in the even sections to an amount in excess of the present value of the swamp lands that could be taken to aid construction of the road. Mr. Steenerson's position was that the inhabitants of the Red River Valley would be without relief a great many years to come, except through the building of the Duluth & Winnipeg road. His remarks were earnestly made and listened to by all persons.

The delegation expressed itself through the Hon. W. W. Billson, of Duluth. Mr. Billson called the attention of the committee to the history of land grants in this country, and showed how they had developed prairies of Illinois and opened up the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, and called attention to the general policy of the state and general government to that subject and to the benefit which had accrued therefrom. He also explained to the committee the difficulty which the Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad company had experienced in obtaining the capital to build that road, and how the enterprise had been placed before capitalists in the east as well as in Europe, but without success; and also gave some of the reasons for such efforts having been hitherto defeated. He spoke of his own action while he was in the legislature with regard to the other swamp land grants made by this state to the various roads, and showed how they had been instrumental in developing all of the centre and south part of the state. Mr. Billson also called the attention of the committee to the fact that substantially all the prominent men of the state had united to that policy in times past, and the wisdom of their action was established by the results attained. Mr. Billson also pointed out the great advantages which had accrued in every point of view in waiving the forfeiture of the Duluth & Iron Range Railroad company whereby there was rendered accessible and opened up to improvement the iron mines in the northeastern part of this state of immense value; something which, he said, would have been postponed for a great many years but for the wise action taken by the legislature in 1883.

Mr. Billson contended that this was no time for departing from the policy of aiding construction of railroads by land grants. He pointed out on the state map that substantially one-third of the state remained a wilderness today merely for want of railway transportation through it and that it was unfair for the representatives from other parts of the state to longer leave that region in its present condition.

Mr. Billson closed his remarks with an explanation of the earnest and unremitting efforts which had been made on the part of the Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad company and of the people of the Duluth end of the Red River Valley to secure the capital required to build the Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad, and that those efforts had resulted in securing the required capital provided the enterprise was put into such shape by the legislature that capital could safely be invested in it; and that it would be unfair and unjust, after so much money had been actually spent on the enterprise, and the road had been partially built, to declare a forfeiture of the grant and thus defeat the consummation of the desired result.

At the close of Mr. Billson's remarks, Gen. Baker made an extended argument in support of the forfeiture bill, claiming to represent no opposing interest, but to be acting merely as a private citizen of the state. This position of the general, in view of public and notorious facts, provoked a broad grin on those present.

Mr. Baker's first position was that the Duluth & Winnipeg people had got so much money in the enterprise that they were compelled to build the road anyhow in order to save themselves, and that therefore the land grant ought to be forfeited; his second position was that the Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad Company never had any grant anyhow. This position he sought to sustain by reference to the various statutes bearing on the subject. His third position was that the era for promoting the building of railroads by land grants had gone by, and that the prevailing sentiment was that all subsisting land grants not already earned should be repealed. His fourth position was that the legislature had no power by waiver of forfeiture to prevent the swamp land grant made in 1878 to the Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad company from reverting to the state. His fifth position was that the land grant in question belonged to the Duluth & Iron Range Railroad company under the statute waiving the forfeiture of that company in 1883; and he claimed to have been largely instrumental in securing such waiver at that time. His sixth position was that the land grant in question now belonged to the St. Paul, Brainerd & Northwestern Railroad company under a statute passed in 1885.

The general's positions were urged at some length, but were lacking in consistency to such an extent as to indicate that his paramount desire was to secure prevention of the building of any road from the Red River Valley to Duluth.

After Gen. Baker, an argument was made on behalf of the Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad company by Mr. Warner, in which he pointed out the inconsistencies of Mr. Baker's positions, and how he could not be urging that in good faith because of his previous positions in similar circumstances in other cases. Mr. Warner went over the legislation bearing on the subject and explained how the land grant to the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad company took effect and also what had been done under it, and the advantages that had accrued to the state from continuing it. He called attention to the action of Gen. Baker with regard to the St. Cloud, Mankato & Austin railroad company in securing a grant of swamp lands to aid in the construction of their road; and also to the general's action in waiver of the forfeiture of the Duluth & Iron Range railroad company, and contended that the general's action in those cases was wise and judicious, and that his speech on this occasion must have proceeded from motives wholly at war with the public good, as well as with his whole action heretofore.

Mr. Warner was succeeded by Mr. Frank D. Kellogg, who produced information furnished him by the state auditor, showing that the Duluth & Iron Range railroad last year had paid into the state treasury taxes amounting to $13,133.37 under 2 per cent. of its gross earnings; that when they came to pay 3 per cent. at their present rate of earnings it would amount to $17,511.16 annually, besides developing iron mines that paid into the treasury last year in taxes $4,500 more. He showed that by the same ratio the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad company would pay annually into the state treasury, in taxes on its earnings, over $69,000, and that the state to-day could not sell the lands included in this grant to realize the income that it would realize from taxes paid by this railroad company, if built. Not only that, but the road would develop a large country now undeveloped and make other taxable property that would swell the state's revenue far beyond what it would realize should these swamp lands remain in their present unaccessible condition, unsaleable and undeveloped. Mr. Kellogg also pointed out the general advantages to be obtained by the state by the building of the proposed road. The sum and substance of his argument was that the revenue which the state would derive from the building of the road would be far in excess of what it would derive from the enforcement of the forfeiture of its swamp lands grant.

How to Sell Rejected Wheat.

Northwestern Agriculturist.

The following interesting feeding test was made by Mr. W. R. Tanner, of Moorhead, Minn., with a low grade of wheat, and shows how rejected grain can be sold at about $1,15 per bushel, with the same labor which would be required to haul it to market:

The wheat we fed, we were offered 25 cents per bushel for; would undoubtedly have been docked 5 or 6 pounds per bushel. It was ground as fine as our mill would make it, dirt and all, and fed dry. Four grade Poland-China hogs were selected of the weights below; they were fed all they would eat twice a day; and given water warmed to a temperature of about 100 degrees. We warmed the water to this excess to be sure it would still be perceptibly warm after striking the cold planks of the trough. From noon, November 30, 1888, until the same hour December 7, we had fed 187 pounds ground wheat, or 3 bushels 7 pounds.

Nov. 30, the weights were:		Dec. 7, the weights were:
No. 1	153	No. 1	177½	gain 24½
" 2	147	" 2	173	" 26
" 3	47	" 3	53	" 10
" 4	55	" 4	67	" 12
Totals	397		469½	gain 72½

This is a total gain of 72½ pounds of pork for 3 bushel and 7 pounds of wheat, valued in the market at 25 cents per bushel.

In reporting the above, Mr. Tanner suggests that if he had sold the grain at the elevator, a dockage of 5 or 6 pounds would have been made for dirt. Why should not elevators deliver to farmers, who want it, an amount of the wheat "screening" equal to dockage in all such cases.

These screening are valuable feed, if ground or treated in some way so as to destroy the weed seeds and there is no good reason apparent why each farmer should not have them returned to him. The elevators in the country use these screening for fuel, but in the large cities they sell them to stockman, who fatten cattle and sheep on them at a very small cost per pound.

Warren Sheaf: Mr. Wm. Box has leased his farm near town and expects to move his family into Warren in the spring. Mr. Box will devote his time to the stock business on a ranch near Roseau Lake. He expects to raise and deal in horses, cattle, sheep and hogs. Will is a rustler and no doubt will make a success of it.

Winter Dairying.

The following article, which we copy from Hoard's Dairyman, was read by Mrs. M. H. Lamb, at the State Dairy Association, held at Faribault, Minn:

At the last meeting of the Northwestern Dairyman's Association, held at Mankato, in 1884, in a short talk with Hiram Smith, of Wisconsin, I made the remark that we had commenced winter dairying. His reply came very decided. "You are on the right track." After seven years of experience I can truly say I cannot see how dairying can profitably be carried on, on any other track.

1. You can get more milk from the same cow by having her fresh in fall, she will milk through the winter with but a small decrease in milk, then when put out in spring on good pasture will increase almost, if not quite to her full flow of milk. When dry, hot weather and flies come, you are ready to have her dry off.

When we first started in the dairy business we had but two cows. Perhaps you think that a small dairy; but you have often heard the saying, "that children have to creep before walking." It is to just such dairymen I wish to talk, —not to large dairymen, for they are supposed to have much dairy knowledge. Although the more educated we are, the more anxious to learn, is generally the rule. They were scrub cows with a small per cent of Short-Horn blood. Were of the same age and nearly of the same size. Gave equal amount of milk till it began to get cold in the fall, when one would persist in drying off, and no amount of feed would keep her from doing so. After making the change to winter dairying she was worth fifty per cent more than before. I do not want to be understood that she gave that much more milk, but that she was worth that much more for reasons that I shall show you farther on.

2. You can get more for the same amount of butter or cream, and you have the satisfaction of putting it on the market when dealers want it, rather than when they look at you as though it were an insult to ask them if they want to buy butter. We have found that there are seven or eight months of the year when good butter commands good prices and meets with ready sale. If you have but little to put on the market the other four months, you are master of the situation. If you wish to contract you can make it in the fall on a rising market, or if put on commission and is of uniform quality, will make its own reputation, that will enable you to sell your summer make to a better advantage. I think I hear you say what has become of that two cow dairyman? But I haven't forgotten him yet. If you can only get him on the track of winter dairying, he is educated to that degree that he is not satisfied with his cows. He thinks if he is going to feed cows for the purpose of making butter he must have better cows. Just at this point he meets with his greatest difficulty. Looks at the little Jersey, she is too small, must have something that he can turn into beef when done with. If he decides in that way he makes the greatest mistake of his dairy life. Such a dairyman will say I am a fanatic, but just wait a moment till I show you my reasons. Twelve years ago we had got as far as five cows. Began to want better stock. Did not have the money to pay for it, but C. A. DeGraff would take stock in return. Gave him two nice steers, 2 and 3 years old, for a 11-months old Short-Horn calf, said to be of good milking stock. One of our neighbors expressed himself thus, "any man that would trade in that way was a fit subject for the lunatic asylum." We raised some nice looking stock and when we sold a 2-year-old heifer for $30 we felt good. Our neighbor felt rather sore when he had to sell his heifer, of same age, for $18. As the heifers developed into cows, began to weed out, sold on an average two each year for beef; consequence was that our dairy did not increase very rapidly. When the idea of winter dairying got rooted we were not satisfied with our dairy cows. My husband went to look at the Jersey, but they were too small. Went again, but still they were too small. Those little crawny calves did not look like his big fellows. At that time he had an offer of a small herd of Jerseys on shares. That struck him favorably as he could test their value without putting any money in it. We set their milk and churned their cream separately three years, and was thoroughly convinced as to their value for butter. Now, will tell you of one herd of big cows, some of them were good cows—too good to sell for beef, and would not sell for what they were worth as dairy cows. Most men will not pay $50 for a cow when they can get as big a one for $25.

Each year would beef one or two; always done so at a loss, for it is a vain delusion when you try to make beef cheaply from a good dairy cow. Five years ago we had four of the best ones left; they were ten years old. Very foolishly decided to let them go farrow, milk and feed high, then dry in the spring and sell for beef. The result can be summed up in a few words. We were not satisfied with the butter while using their milk. Have kept them dry on good pasture all summer to fatten Last week we butchered one—she brought us $22.

We will credit her for 100 pounds of butter through the winter ($25.00) making her bring $47 for the year.

If we had bred her and milked her for the year, she would have given us 300 pounds of butter, which at 34 cents a pound, the average for the year, would be $72, or a balance of $25. If we had then killed her and buried her, we would have got $3 for her hide, or a credit of $28. So much for keeping a dairy cow. Perhaps I have dwelt on this too long, but if I can help one dairyman to start right, will feel well paid. When you go out to look for a dairy cow, look for a dairy form, and do not allow yourself to think of beef. There are good dairy cows in all breeds, but are much more likely to find them in those breeds that have never been bred for beef. In winter dairying you can hardly obey the scripture injunction, "Take no heed for the morrow," for it takes a great amount of forethought to make it a success. You will have to give up some of your cherished wheat land, to raise corn and clover for feed.

In a talk with a neighbor he admitted that two crops of clover were more satisfactory than a poor crop of wheat, but said his wife was not willing to raise clover; for what would their cows do for straw to live on if they did not raise wheat? By stabling your cows, and feeding highly with bran, you can so enrich your land that it will yield far better to the acre, therefore reducing the cost per bushel. After you get fair-launched in winter dairying, the wheat fields are apt to disappear. A good dairyman cannot see any money in raising wheat. Corn as well as clover is a grand crop for fodder. In Southern Minnesota they both yield large crops. Not on your worn out land without fertilizing. Oh, no! That is the reason of so many failures. Land well fertilized will withstand the drouth, and grow a crop in much shorter time than on worn out land. Corn left in the field till after frost, husked, and the cows turned in to feed on the ruined fodder, is one of the most distressing sights I meet with in the West. But we see less of such waste than ten years ago. Farmers begin to appreciate the value of the fodder for their stock in winter, and when nicely secured, it is far better for cows than wild hay.

After they are convinced of that, they will soon see the economy of cutting it up ears and all into the silo, thus saving the expense of husking and grinding. Such feed together with bran, early cut clover hay and warm stables, will give you good returns at the milk pail. It is not necessary, though very convenient, to have a barn. A very cheap stable can be built with cheap lumber for sides, poles for rafters and hay for shingles. Such a stable is not a handsome structure, but if conveniently arranged and filled with good dairy cows, will look very cozy on the inside. We used such a stable for 12 years and the last year of using it made sixteen hundred dollars worth of butter. The way to make cows give milk in winter is, as Dr. Dickson says of the way to make hens lay eggs in winter, is to make them think it is summer. You will be obliged to hire help the year round, but that is an advantage, for you get steadier men. A man who goes to a saloon does not apply for work on a dairy farm. He knows that he is not wanted there. In building a barn study to save all the labor you can. We have boxes attached to hay carriers that run on the track behind the cows, the track runs out doors and by pulling a peg the box dumps itself over the wagon or sled; which saves handling the manure but once, till it is in the field where it is spread.

The help required to do the milking will enable you to draw it out every day. Now comes the other great stumbling. The day of setting milk in pans behind the pantry door to make good butter, is past. Many, right here, make a great mistake; they are told that cans set in a barrel will answer just as well as to buy a creamer. Of course that takes, for most any utensils will answer for the "wimmin" folks. I say you cannot afford to do without first-class dairy implements even if for but two cows. We sold from those two cows I told you of, after supplying a family of six for the year, 200 pounds of butter which sold for 12½ cents per pound, or $25 at the store. That was fourteen years ago, and was the last butter we sold at the store. If those cows had been winter cows, and the milk set in a good creamer, we would have sold at least three hundred pounds at 25 cents per pound, or $75; a gain of $50, or enough to buy an outfit for ten cows. A good milk-room, like the barn, is convenient to have, but you can set a creamer in any convenient place, and make good butter, without such a room. When you send butter to market have it look neat and attractive, that will cause it to be examined more carefully than if not attractive on the outside. If you do not get somewhere near market quotations do not blame grocer or commission man, but look to your own dairy and see if there is not a screw loose somewhere. Educate yourself by reading good dairy papers, you will find many contradictory statements, but see if you cannot pick something from them that will benefit you. You cannot do as Mr. A. or Mr. B. does, your surroundings are not the same, but use your own brains together with their's to enable you to make the most of what you have.

Young Men May Save or Waste.

American Agriculturist.

For many years I have held to the opinion that no employment offers better opportunities for young men to acquire a start in life than work on a farm. Here are some cases in point:

The son, eighteen years old, of our washerwoman, has $250 drawing six per cent interest, which he has saved since he was fourteen years old. In addition, he will in a few days receive $140 for seven month's labor the past summer, $100 of which he proposes to loan, making $350 in all, the interest of which will buy him a good suit of clothes each year. He hopes to have $600 laid by when he attains his majority. This sum he intends to invest in ten acres of good land, working a few years more to earn a team and tools when he will be in a fair way to be independent for life.

The course of another young man is in direct contrast with the above. Fourteen years ago, when sixteen years old, he began to drive team for a farmer near town at $25 per month. He worked for the same man until a few months ago, losing but little time. Wages are lower now, and for the last two years he has received only $200 per year, but for the whole time his wagers have probably averaged $240 per year. Of this amount he could have easily saved $150 per year, or a total of $2,100, the interest of which would have increased it to $3,000. Instead of this, when finally discharged on account of drunkenness, he had nothing ahead. He had drawn his wages and spent them as he went along.

Three years ago I had in my employ through the summer months a young man who graduated the following year at a village high school where the standard of scholarship was high. He was a capable farm laborer, but this was too slow and quiet a life for him so he went to Cleveland, where he works as driver on a street railroad. His associates are low and uneducated, and I doubt if he has saved a cent. Farm life may be slow and quiet, but it keeps young men occupied either working or resting, and it is not as expensive for clothes as those occupations which forbid the wearing of patched or ragged garments. The farm hand has neither the opportunity nor the temptation to spend money that lies in the path of young men who work in town.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., FEBRUARY 28, 1889.

'Round Home.

Lovely weathy.

Weather prophets predict an early spring. The weather so far this week seems to justify the prediction.

Mrs. Andrew Huske died on Monday morning at 2 o'clock of consumption. Funeral occurred on Wednesday.

It is singular how everybody seems to be so personally interested in O. H. Lucken, our genial county treasurer in these days.

Many of our friends are coming forward with those little subscriptions. Thanks, friends. These little acts of kindness help out on our personal taxes wonderfully.

C. G. Rapp, of St. Hilaire, said to us on Tuesday: "Set 'er ahead another peg!" Thanks, Charlie, we gladly pass $1.50 to your account on subscription.

The Fisher Bulletin mentions the death of the little daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Howard Lankester, which sad event occurred last week. The doctor's friends here extend their earnest sympathy.

J. Jorgenson and Peter Berg have dissolved partnership. The business will be carried on by Mr. Jorgenson at the old stand. Peter has not decided what he will do yet but thinks he will engage in business here later.

Osmund Osmundson was up from Mallory on Tuesday shaking hands with his friends and reminding them of the fact that next Monday the administration changes hands. He is one of the leading republicans in his section and of course he is not regretting the change in the deal.

representatives who should oppose us in this matter by voting for or aiding the forfeiture bill would thoroughly and wholly misrepresent his constituents would be held accountable for such misrepresentation. From what Mr. Sampson said we understand that he will vote against the forfeiture bill and will vote for the extension bill.

Elsewhere in this issue will be seen D. L. Wellman's opinion on the advisability of sowing damaged wheat. Mr. W. is one of the most careful among our practical farmers, a man who would not urge any course that he was not fully persuaded is right. It is his opinion that our damaged wheat is all right and he advises its use for seed rather than to pay $1.25 per bushel for seed.

Senator B. Sampson was up from St. Paul last week. On Saturday afternoon a public meeting was held at the office of Judge Christianson, at which Mr. Sampson was present to ascertain the views and wishes of his constituents. The sentiment of the people was found to be universally in favor of the issue of bonds for railroad purposes and Mr. Sampson agreed to introduce the bill now in his hands early in March, not later than the 11th. The expressions in favor of the defeat of the Duluth & Winnipeg forfeiture bill were emphatic and so unanimous that Mr. Sampson could not but see that if he wishes to please his constituents he will do all in his power to defeat the forfeiture bill and will also do what he can to aid the passage of the bill to extend the time for earning the grant. Our people fully appreciate the benefits the building of the D. & W. road would be to this country and know that so far from opposing the road, or doing anything to hinder its building it is for our true interest to do all we can to aid it in every possible way and any of our

Dr. C. E. Dampier returned from Fergus Fall this week where he was last week summoned by the illness and death of his father, Capt. E. Dampier, who died of pneumonia, on Friday evening at 8:45, after an illness of only one week's duration. Capt. Dampier was born in Paris, on June 8th, 1829 consequently would have been 60 years old next June. At the age of three years he migrated to this country, settling at Waterloo, Canada, where he lived for many years. He married Miss Charlotte M. Parmelee, a native of Vermont. In 1857 he moved to Steele County, Minn, settling near Owatonna, afterward removing to Hampton, Dakota County. Here he enlisted in Hatch's independent batallion, in which he served his country for two years as 1st Lieut. In 1874 he went to Northfield where he opened and kept the Dampier hotel, later the Archer house. In 1881 he moved to Fergus Falls where he has since resided. He leaves a widow and seven children to mourn his loss, the first death to sever the family ties. His children are Dr. C. E. Dampier, of this city, A. W. Dampier, Northfield, Mrs. Scott Smith, La Crosse, Dr. H. G. Dampier, Grand Forks, Fred Dampier, Barnesville, Miss Lotta Dampier, of La Crosse and Miss Maud Dampier who is now attending school at St. Cloud. The children were all in attendance at the funeral on Sunday except Miss Lottie, who unfortunately missed her train at St. Paul on Saturday evening and was thus delayed until Monday. The funeral was held under the auspices of Stanton Post G. A. R. of which the Capt. was a member. The remains were deposited in a vault and will probably be removed to Northfield.

Look out for personal delinquent taxes to-morrow.

Recon Uncle John must have been on deck again this week.

John Kops took in Richards & Millard's Musical Tourists Tuesday evening. Johnny git yer gun, git yer gun!

Jos. Brewster, of Fisher, dropped in on Monday to set that subscription ahead a peg. These pleasant little calls do us good in more ways than one.

In the face of a rising market elsewhere, wheat slumped off two cents in this market the quoted price Wednesday morning being 99 cents for 1 Hard.

Did you see Richards & Millard's Musical Tourists? If not go and kick yourself several times around the public square as you missed the treat of the season.

Harry Attix' little muels have worn the snow all off the road between the 5th ward and the city—delivering goods. Harry says he has quit smoking which makes a lively trade for the firm—in gum.

Last week our typo made us say that "Duncan" Bain has seed wheat for sale. Well, may be he has, that's none of our business, as he is not the man we meant at all. DONALD Bain, of Fisher, is the man who has the GOOD wheat for sale.

Swan Hovik has bought out Archambeault's undertaking business, is fitting up the building on Robert Street, recently occupied by Christianson Bros., and will be ready for business the latter part of the week. He will keep everything in that line, will also have a cabinet shop in the rear.

D. A. Daniels, of Minneapolis, a brother of Senator Daniels, was in the city last Friday calling on his former pupil, Att'y Ed. George, Esq. Ed. used to be in Daniels' Sunday school class when he was a little chap in pinafores. He says of those days that he was so bashful that he dare not speak to a girl unless she was about four miles away, deaf, blind and homely enough to stop a clock.

The Richards & Millard's Musical Tourists entertainment was one of the pleasantest and most unique affairs ever witnessed in our city. The gentlemen have fine voices, highly cultivated, while as a character singer Mr. C. L. Millard beats Sol. Smith Russel, to our notion. Miss Gertie Cady is an accomplished pianist, while Miss Amalia Rippe possesses a pure, sweet and strong soprano voice, excellently well trained. The company is deserving of better houses than they got and the entertainment was highly enjoyed by all who attended.

Capt. A. Locken died at his residence in Roome on Sunday evening at 11 o'clock. He came to Polk County nine year ago, bought some railroad land in town of Roome and brought his family here. Later with his brother J. H. Locken the mercantile firm of J. H. & A. Locken was started in this city. He has been away from his home much of the time since locating here, engaged in the pursuit of business in his profession, that of river pilot on the Mississippi, until ill-health forced him to abandon it. He made one trip to California but it was of no avail; the fell destroyer, consumption had marked him as its victim and he returned home but to die. He leaves a wife and four children to mourn his loss. The funeral services take place to-day.

Wm. Senske came up from Nesbit on Tuesday to pay his personal taxes. While in the auditor's office O. C. Bergland dropped in and began to talk with Mac. about the purchase of some poplar poles for fencing, whereupon Senske says "the idea that some have of the danger of wire for fencing is absurd. I have fenced with wire ever since I was in this country have had as wild and frisky colts and horses in my pasture as any farmer can have and I never had an animal hurt yet. Moreover my fence is hog tight as well. My fence is five wires high the two lower spaces 6 inches and the others 10 inches apart. I use galvanized and painted wire alternately and this, I think is one reason why my stock is not hurt, as they are enabled to distinguish the fence better by this method."

Representative Roberts told us a few days ago that his trip to the state experimental farm convinced him that much of our damaged wheat, which has been deemed unfit for seed is not as bad as is generally supposed. Some of the worst samples they had germinated 80 per cent. and the best seemed as good as wheat that had not been hurt at all. Mr. R. said before he made that trip he had intended to apply for his seed from the state, but he is so fully convinced now that he will use his damaged wheat for seed. One difficulty that presents itself to us is the amount of the damaged seed that will be required per acre? In its shrunken condition there would seem to be more grains per bushel than in sound plump wheat, and, if every grain germinates and grows it would seem to require less bushels per acre. But how much is the question. Some have the idea that because the wheat is inferior it will require more bushels per acre. Which theory is right is an important point for the farmer to determine and a question that will materially affect his yield. An interchange of opinions on this subject would be of great value and we should like our farmers to write us their views in a short article that all may receive the benefit of their opinions. THE JOURNAL will gladly publish the views of such of our farmers as desire to give them.

What's the matter with Crookston? She's all right! With two new roads, the N. P. and the Duluth & Winnipeg bound to come in the near future. You bet she is!

Tom Erwin, of Fisher, dropped in on Washington's Birthday to encourage our labors by a paid up subscription in advance. He reports that little, if any, seed wheat will be needed from the state, in his town.

All who desire to furnish us wood on subscription this winter should take advantage of this kind of weather to do it. The administration will change March 4th, after which we don't expect to need as much as now.

John Dillon, supported by a very good troupe, appeared at the Opera House on Friday evening and was greeted by a large and well pleased audience. Dillon is always good, and the "Toots" of Miss Ida May Blake was excellently well taken. She is a pleasing little actress. The play is only intended for a laughable farce and is well calculated for the purpose.

The Duluth Herald says work will be re-commenced on the Duluth & Winnipeg as soon as the weather moderates sufficiently to allow good progress. The surveying party, which has been at work on the line between Grand Rapids and the Floodwood River, have broken camp. Mr. Knowlton, chief of the party, says the grade does not exceed fifteen feet to the mile at any place on the line west of Cloquet, and that everything is favorable for a good road bed.

Thomas Scott was in from Sletten this week to leave a bit of wealth with the county on account of personal taxes and incidentally dropped in to replenish our cash account and make us feel good. He says that the blight seriously affected some crops even out in that rolling country where there is little, if any, wet lands, but there will be wheat enough for seed. He is of the opinion that very few farmers out there will avail themselves of the opportunity to procure wheat by State aid. Says the village of McIntosh will do some tall building this spring, as will also Fosston.

Farm loans completed and money paid over the day application is made.

STEENERSON & MCMANUS.

Talking with auditor McGuire upon the method of distributing the seed wheat under the law, we suggested that if a man could buy his wheat of his neighbor and pay by order on the auditor, it might be preferable. He says he sees no reason why that cannot be done. The point is that, remote from a market place, a farmer ought to buy wheat for less than he could here and save the hauling of it. Or, if he preferred to buy wheat that was slightly affected at a good discount, he could do that. There is no doubt that the auditor and the Board will give the farmers all the benefits possible under the act.

We do not know what, if any, arrangements the County Board has made in relation to buying seed wheat, but we wish to suggest the idea of giving our own farmers, who have good wheat for sale, the first chance to supply it. We learn that wheat has been kept in certain elevators on purpose to supply this demand, but we think our farmers are entitled to the first chance, and would suggest that the Board advertise in every paper in the county, from now until the supply is met, the said advertisement to be published free of cost to the Board, or any other man. In this way all who have seed wheat for sale can find a ready and sure market, and the money derived be left where it belongs—with the farmers. We will give the county all the advertising space it requires for this purpose, free of cost.

Swan Anderson was down from Wylia this week, and dropped in to square up that little subscription account. Swan said: "I don't like to work a long time for a man and get nothing for it, and I suppose newspaper men feel that way, if they don't always say so. One thing I know THE JOURNAL is worth to me 10 times what it costs me, and if any man earns his money you certainly do." Swan says but few in his town will apply for seed wheat, preferring to get it other ways. Most of them will have all they need. He thinks the bill should have been drawn in such a way as to have allowed every individual to buy where he could do so to the best advantage. As it is, he has to take whatever may be offered at whatever price it may happen to be. We believe with him that wherever it is possible for a man to get wheat it is better to let the state seed wheat go.

Max Ericsson returned from a visit to the far west this week. He visited Seattle, Portland, Tacoma and other noted places and gives an interesting account of what he saw. It is interesting to hear him describe the citizens of that dampish country with the moss on their backs two inches thick—or was it the roofs that he said have moss-backs? When about to leave Tacoma the guard at the train halted him and pointed at his feet, upon which several acres of Tacoma mud gently rested objected to his departing with so many corner lots, as real-estate there ranges from $1,000 to $15,000 per front foot. Being in somewhat of a hurry Max just slipped his rubbers off and jumped upon the moving train glad to get away thus easily. Says all of our boys whom he saw are enjoying life hugely and thinks he would like the country as soon as he got used to the climate but hardly dare risk too big a dose at once least he become web-footed like a duck or a native. He thinks Seattle the best town he saw, for business and every way.

SEED WHEAT.

What You Have to Do to Get It.

County Auditor McGuire is daily besieged by applications for wheat under the seed grain act, notwithstanding the law provides that all applications must be made to the town clerk in the town where applicant lives. The amount obtained must be paid for one-half in the fall of '89, and the balance in the fall of '90. The auditor informs us that at the rate applications come in, he estimates that it would require $90,000 to supply Polk County with seed. If Kittson, Marshall, Norman, Clay and Becker require seed in like proportion the appropriation is far too limited to do any great amount of good. The following is a copy of the application that must be filed with the town clerk:

The treasurer's office has been a veritable bee-hive this week, made so by the crowds rushing in to save the tax penalty accruing on March 1st. On Saturday we went up to pay our personal tax (fact) and could not get within 19½ miles, (more or less) of our good looking treasurer, who beamed upon us over his gold-bowed spectacles as benignantly as a bull-frog on a toad-stool in a thunder shower. Life was too short to waste in the fruitless attempt to pay taxes, so we accepted 50 cents for our place in the crowd and adjourned till a more convenient season. Auditor McGuire informs us that the personals have been coming in slow this year but are now beginning to hustle. "Get on board, chil'en," for to-morrow you go delinquent.

Once more your worthy correspondent is aroused by the tinkling of sleigh bells and the jolly singing of the men and maidens who have been fortunate enough to secure a home in this favored locality.

What in the duce became of that newly married couple from this town, mentioned in the Times a while ago? Whosoever the gentleman may be; we would advise him to announce it at once, or somebody might make a mistake.

There was a grand dance at Wm. Tatro's last Friday. According to the reports of the girls they had a "jolly old time," and it don't matter if the boys enjoyed themselves or not.

'Tis very interesting, said an old man the other day, to see a set of lively young rustics swing their bonnie lassies around on the floor; some bouncing badly here and there with unwonted vigor, as if their whole frame was composed of nothing but joints; others hopping about with faces expressive of the most intense solemnity, as if a quadrille were not a thing to be laughed at, but a severe trial to the feelings, which it requires inflexible resolution to encounter.

Duluth and Crookston.

Lake Superior News: Crookston is at last awake to the necessity of closer connection with the great water ways at Duluth. Her citizens are at work and the outlook seems favorable for the early construction of a branch from that city to a junction with the Duluth & Manitoba. They are also working in the direction of securing the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad.

Sneer as they may, the Twin Cities can no longer hide from themselves and the world the fact that Duluth is looked upon by the cities and villages of Northern Minnesota and Dakota as their natural trade center. If this is not true why this determination to secure a connection with Duluth, no matter what expense, must needs be incurred? Why are such companies as the Duluth, Willmar & Sioux Falls, Duluth, Red Wing & Southern, Duluth, Crookston & Northern, Duluth, Rainy Lake & Southern, and many others formed, either for the purpose of building independent lines to Duluth or becoming a branch to the same one of the great road already reaching this city? The fact is potent to all, that the Northwest will make Duluth its emporium, the Twins to the contrary not-withstanding.

Grand Forks Herald: S. L. Dobson, of Crookston, is in town. Mr. Dobson represents himself as a representative oatmeal man. For years and years, Dob. trod the avenues of the drummer, disposing of teas, and teas. Everybody knows him.

Grand Forks Daily Herald: About two weeks ago Drs. Bahnson of Fisher, and Engstad of this city, assisted by Dr. Hanson of Crookston, performed the critical operation of ovariotomy on a lady near Fisher. The woman had been suffering for years and when the doctors opened her abdominal cavity and removed a sixteen pound uterine fibroid tumor, they only did so as a last resort to save her life. For a few days the lady was in extreme danger, but carful treatment has brought her to a stage where recovery is certain. This is the second case of the kind operated by these physicians and is a fitting comment upon their skill.

BIRD SHOT ENDS A BEAR.

Two Hunters Have a Very Exciting Matinee With Bruin.

A bear-hunt up in the woods of Lewis county on the 1st day of January is a rare thing, because the good old-fashioned winters of the Black river country usually set in in November. Numbers of the shaggy brutes have seen there of late, and at least two have been shot within a week. Coupled with the killing of one of them is an exciting story, which was told a New York Times reporter by Leonard Bullock of Jefferson county, who had a hand in the fight.

"On new year's day," said Mr. Bullock, "Joe Spaulding and myself thought we would go out for a hunt over toward the Salmon river. Joe, who is my nearest neighbor, had been out rabbit-hunting the day before and did not have very good luck, so he wanted me to take my dog and go with him to try it again. We had to go about five miles to reach a place where rabbits were plenty, but when we got there we had great sport for a short time. The dogs put the rabbits up in fine shape and before we had been in the brush an hour we had bagged eight of them. We then started for a new place, as we had about exhausted the supply in that locality. In going from one piece of woods to another we struck a bear's track that looked pretty fresh. We had not thought of a bear hunt for that day, and neither of us had anything more effective than No. 6 shot—size that is large enough for rabbits, but rather dangerous to use on a hungry and ugly black bear. We could not let the lack of proper ammunition prevent us from following the bear, however, so we quit rabbit-hunting right there, and, starting the dog after the animal, proceeded to run him down.

"Under ordinary circumstances this would have been a tiresome job, for the bear would have done his best to get away, and would have given us a long chase. The bear we were after, however, was not a runner, but a fighter. He made no effort to get away apparently, for after a two hours' tramp we came up with him out in an open piece of timber, where he and the dog were having a first-class time all by themselves. The bear was up on his haunches and the dog, who had evidently been indiscreet on the start, was prancing wildly around him, taking good care in the meantime to keep about two rods away. The dog's head was covered with blood, evidently from a cut inflicted by the bear in the first round. As that bear stood up and kept turning around to watch the dog I think he was the ugliest-looking brute I ever laid eyes on. He did not look a bit like an animal that you would want to tackle with a double-barreled shotgun loaded with No. 6 shot.

"Though we approached to within a dozen rods of him he did not pay the slightest attention to us, and we concluded that he would be a pretty tough customer to tackle. But we did not propose to let him get away from us, even if we took the chances of a rough-and-tumble fight. There were four good loads of shot in our guns, but unless fired at short range they would be likely to increase rather than lessen the bear's fighting capacity. Seeing that he did not intend to run or take to a tree, there was but one thing to do and that was to make an advance on him. Right here it occurred to me that a little ruse, such as I have used before now in shooting woodchucks, would work well. It was for Spaulding to get in range of a big hemlock that stood near the bear, and, keeping the tree between himself and the animal, to stealthily approach, while I kept in plain sight and diverted the brute's attention. The trick worked to perfection. Spaulding got within two rods of the savage beast without being observed. Then the exciting part of the bear-hunt began. I saw Spaulding raise his gun and glance around the tree and then I knew there would be some fun or a dead bear in no time.

"Joe pulled the trigger, but before the gun went off it seemed as though the bear dropped on all fours and dodged the shot, for he started like a black streak for the tree behind which Joe stood. I expected to see my neighbor clawed into mince-meat in less than ten seconds, but I hadn't counted on his being quick as lightning and as cool as a cucumber. When the bear went for him he just took notice of which side of the tree he meant to come and then dodged to another tree ten feet away before the brute could turn himself around. At this point, I can tell you, things were interesting. The dog gained courage and tackled the bear in the rear. This turned his attention from Joe, who got in a shot with the other barrel of his gun, but it did not bring the animal down. The bear started for him again, and then I took a hand in. I ran up and fired at a distance of about ten paces, and, though I was pretty shaky, it was a good shot. It dropped Bruin and left him writhing and snarling on the ground. I finished him with the other barrel and saved Spaulding from a glorious or a horrible death, call it which you please.

"If I had not been around just then there would have been a hand-to-hand fight, and it is easy enough to guess who would have got the best of it. We calculated that the bear would weigh about three hundred and fifty pounds, while Spaulding only tips the scale at 150. This bear was the only one I ever saw that showed fight. The brutes are nearly always afraid of men and will do their best to get out of their way when hunted. I have helped kill five of them in my lifetime, and this is the only one of the five that showed a disposition to fight the hunters. My advice, however, is to hunt bears with something besides a shotgun loaded with birdshot, because if you don't you are likely to have your hands full. My neighbor and myself are congratulating ourselves on a very lucky escape.

SHE LOVES ME—LOVES ME NOT.

I wonder if the daisy knows
It says you love me dearly?
I wonder if the pink and rose,
And every flower that 'round us grows,
Know I love you sincerely?

They must, else why should every one
Seek to remaind me of you?
Why shouldn't they? Beneath the sun
There's not a bird but has begun
To sing of how I love you.

But has this daisy told the truth?
I hardly dare believe it!
Can Beauty love the Beast uncouth?
The statement is so strange, forsooth,
I hardly dare receive it.

And yet I wish it might be so,
This fortune that it offers;
'Twere better than Fame's empty show,
Or Power, or Wisdom's overflow,
Or never-failing coffers.

—Karl M. Sherman, in Demorest's Monthly.

One Love Of His Life.

An old gentleman, leaning forward with his hands clasped over a gold-headed cane, was seated in a summer-house situated upon the grounds of a hotel at a fashionablewateingrplace. He was in a corner, hidden by drooping vines, and his face expressed deep and apparently painful thought. The refrain of sad musing was:

Only one person in the whole world to love me, and I shall lose even that love now!"

On the other side of the summer-house, divided from the side the old gentleman occupied by a rustic partition, two ladies, young and fair, rustled in, and raking out some fancy work settled down for a chat.

One was tall, and dressed in a pretty costume that was at once youthful and matronly; the other was petite, blonde, and not more than 18. Mrs. Courtland spoke first.

Embroidery, Alice?" she said. "A handsome handkerchief corner. For your trousseau?"

"Yes," and the sweet voice faltered while a burning blush crimsoned the fair cheek, "Is it not pretty?"

"Very. I want to talk about your prospects, child. Your Aunt Marcia tells me you are making a splendid match."

"Did she? I think so, Blanche. Malcolm is so noble and good, and a true Christain!"

"But your aunt tells me he is the favorate nephew of the great oil merchant, Hiram Bates, whose wealth is something enormous. You have only to help him play his cards well, and he will probably be heir to a magnificent fortune. But what ails you? You look as if I were telling you a piece of news."

"I think Aunt Marcia has been misinformed, that is all."

"Then he is not Hiram Bates' nephew?"

"I never heard him speak of a rich uncle, and I am quite sure he has no hope of inheriting money. He has a good salary, and my little fortune will buy and furnish a small house, so we can make a comfortable, and, I hope, a happy home."

"Did he never speak to you of his uncle?"

"Never of a rich uncle. He has told me of a lame uncle, his mother's brother, who has been very kind to him, given him an education and a start in business. He always talks of him with the deepest love and pity."

"Pity!"

"He suffers torture from the effects of a fall that has lamed him for life and often causes him weeks of agonizing pain. Malcolm tells me with tears in his eyes of his fear of losing this dearest friend and kind uncle, and I think he hopes I may be useful in nursing him."

"I wonder if he is the same?"

The old man leaning upon his cane was thinking.

"Can it be true? Does Malcolm think so little of my money, that will be his, that he has never even mentioned it to his promised wife? Can it be that I shall gain a loving, tender niece instead of losing my nephew, when Malcolm marries?"

Loving his nephew so deeply, Hiram Bates had felt a keen pain at the news of his betrothal. He had never seen Alice Hunter, but he knew that she had been brought up in a circle of fashion, and was the orphan niece of one of society's gayest votaries, Mrs. Marcia Heydon.

He ascertained by inquiry that the young girl had inherited $10,000 from her father and that her winters were spent with her Aunt Marcia, her summers with a maiden sister of her father. She was quite a belle, though only in society one season, pretty and accomplished, and the old man groaned in spirit over his nephew's choice.

A belle, and with a head full of fashionable frivolity, he was convinced that the girl had been won by the prospect of Malcolm's heirship to his own fortune. He had seen in the futre his nephew estranged from him by the influence of a dressy, empty-headed woman, or still more oppalling, his niece-to-be making false protestation of affection, with a hope of winning golden favors.

While he mused upon the conversation he had overheard, the silvery voices of his young neighbors still sounding beside him, there was a sudden crash, something struck him upon the head and he lost consciousness.

Cries from the summer-house, from groups of people collected in the grounds, brought a party of men speedily to the spot. The rotten posts supporting the roof upon one side had given way and the side and roof had fallen in. Mrs. Courtland and Miss Hunter were buried under the fallen timbers, but were uninjured. Not so the old gentleman, who had been their unsuspected listener. He was taken out pallid and senseless.

Nobody knew him. He had come on the morning train, had taken breakfast, but no room, and asked the hour for the return train. A surgeon, summoned as speedily as possible, announced a broken arm and an injury to the head, making a likelihood of a long, tedious illness. There was some animated discussion some suggestions of hospital, a search through the pockets of the unconscious victim, resulting in the discovery of a small sum of money, but no letters, papers or cards, and finally a desertion of one and another, each going his or her way, with the comforting reflection:

"It's none of my business."

But when they had all deserted the injured man the surgeon, still busy binding up his arm as he lay upon a bench, brought from the ruined summer-house, felt a light touch on his hand, and looked up to see a little figure in mourning with a sweet face, very pale.

"Can I help you?" Alice Hunter asked.

"No, child, not now."

"What will they do with him?"

"I suppose he must go to a New York hospital."

"But the ride—the journey?"

"Will cause great additional suffering, perhaps result in death."

"Doctor, will they keep him here if he is paid for?"

"Certainly; but there it not money enough about him to pay his board a week."

"I will pay for it."

"You?"

"Yes; I will not let him die for want of money I have. He"—and her lip quivered—"he looks like my dear father who is dead."

"H'm—yes. Here come the fellows to take him to the station. I think I will take him to the little cottage where I board. It will cost less and be more quiet."

Mrs. Courtland declared Alice was outraging the proprieties most dreadfully when the young girl went to the cottage and offered her services as nurse to the doctor; but Aunt Sophie silenced comment by moving her belongings from the hotel to the quiet boarding house, and the doctor found he had a valuable assistant.

Alice, explained, in her quiet, low voice, that her father was ill for nine months before he died, and she was his nurse. This accounted for the noiseless woolen dresses, the velvet shod feet, the quick eye and ready hand, and, when the sufferer recovered consciousness, the gentle voice and tact that quieted him in paroxysms of pain and fever. Aunt Sophie was too much of an invalid herself to help, but she sat beside the bed while Alice moved to and fro, made dainty soups and tempting dishes, and performed all nursing duties.

The invalid had one long talk with the doctor and then submitted to the gentle administration of the two women, only insisting upon a man the doctor provided being with him at night and within call.

The season was over, and only those three remained of the summer boarders at the little cottage, when one cool October day the sick man, now fast recovering, called Alice to to him.

"I shall soon be well again," he said regretfully.

"Yes," she answered cheerily; "very soon."

"I shall miss my nurse."

And I my patient; but I am glad you are recovering. We were afraid at one time there would be a more painful.

"You mean I was in danger of dying. Why should that be painful. I am old."

She made no answer, looking sorrowfully into his uplifted eyes.

"And a burden upon you, the doctor tells me. Why did you make yourself responsible for a stranger?"

The fair face flushed, the soft eyes were dewy with feeling as Alice said softly:

"Because you are old and seemed poor and friendless. I was glad it was in my power to aid you. Do you think it was at any great cost," she added, with a generous desire to lighten the burden of obligation, "I have some money lying idle."

"For the wedding day perhaps. Well, child, you might have poorer jewels to deck your bridle than an old man's tears and gratitude and love. I am getting well and shall soon leave you; will you give me a keepsake?"

The girl loosened a little locket from the chain around her throat cut off one of her golden curls and put it in the place of some she took out, and laid the trinket in the old man's hand.

"With my love," she said softly.

"Ah, child," he sighed, "an old man, sick and feeble, wins little love."

"Yet," she said earnestly, "you must believe that I have nursed you since you were conscious, with affection. My own father is gone, but if you ever want a daughter's affection, believe me, I will gladly come to you, if possible.

Three days later the little cottage was deserted. Aunt Sophie and she returned to their home to make up for lost time on dressmaking and sewing, and Alice cheerfully paid out of her small patrimony for the board and expense of her venerable patient.

She little guessed how deep an impression her care and tenderness had made upon the heart so long closed against human affection, so distrustful of any advances from his fellow creatures. It was a revelation to him, this active charity of an utter stranger. He had gone to the hotel merely to see Malcolm's choice and had purposely left all clew to his identity behind him. He had intended meeting Alice, if possible, unknown and watching her unobserved, but accident had thrown them together in a way he little anticipated. The first use he made of his recovery was to write to his nephew, and Malcolm met him at the depot, when he returned home.

Knowing nothing of the recent accident, the young man was shocked at the change in his uncle's face.

"You have been ill?" he cried.

"Very ill."

"Why did you not send for me?"

"I had even better nursing than yours, Malcolm. Don't ask me any questions now, but tell me about your marriage preparations."

"Alice has gone home and will remain until November. Then she comes to Mrs. Haydon's and will buy house and furniture."

"In November?"

"Yes."

Late in November she came, her trunks full of Aunt Sophie's daintiest stitching, and Aunt Marcia gave her cordial greeting. A grand wedding was the display upon which this lady had set her heart, and Alice shrank a little at the comments upon the rich uncle, and her own good fortune in the "first-rate match."

But just before the wedding day a little note was brought to Alice by a gorgeous footman, who was driving to her aunt's behind a private carriage. The note was from Malcolm, and begged her to come to him in the carriage.

Wondering, but obedient, Alice was speedily ready, and was driven to a handsome brown stone house, where the door was opened to usher her into a stylish drawing room, where a gentleman awaited her, and Malcolm advancing said:

"My Uncle Hiram, Alice."

Kindly blue eyes looked into her own, withered hands were extended, and a voice she knew well, said:

"We are old friends, Malcolm. Are we not, Alice?"

Then, before she could answer, the old man continued:

"I have thought, Alice, that it was unkind to have my nephew wait for my death before sharing my wealth. I have borne a curse of distrust in my heart for many years, thinking my money won me all the affection, save Malcolm's, that was offered me. But though you are well content to wed the young clerk, and put your own patrimony into his home, you must not refuse my heir, who has accepted from me an income that makes him independent, and this home."

"My love for Malcolm can bear riches or poverty," was the answer; "but, sir, our home needs you. You will come, will you not, to the children, who will try to make your life happy by loving care? Long before I knew you, Malcolm told me he hoped when he had a home, to win you to live in it. Will you let me, too, beg of you to come to us."

"Gladly, child! gladly!" the old man said.

So, where the rich lonely man had feared to lose the one love of his life, he gained another tenderer sweeter love, to brighten his declining years by a daughter's devotion and affection.

Big Bug and Small Potato.

Ex-Attorney General Palmer is fond of a joke, and he isn't put out a bit if the joke is on him, just so it is funny. He dresses very neatly and is not given to jewelry except in the matter of a scarf pin, and an adornment of this character once led to a remark about him that set all Wilkesbarre to laughing. He had purchased a very handsome pin in the shape of a bug, which was of rather loud size and pretty conspicuous. It looked like an exaggerated potato bug. His friends guyed him considearbly about it, and the scarf pin became the talk of the town. One day a prominent German saloon keeper passed Mr. Palmer as the latter stood at his office door, looked out the corner of his eye at the scarf pin and smiled. Instantly the attorney, in his quick, sharp way, said:

"Well, Dutchy, what's the matter with you? What are you laughing at?"

"Oh, nodings, Mr. Balmer."

"Yes, you were. You were laughing at this scarf pin. What's the matter with it?"

"I guess it's all right, Mr. Balmer."

"Well, look at it and see. Is there anything the matter with it? Examine it."

The German drew nigh, carefully scanned the pin, looked it over gravely, and was about to turn away, when Mr. Palmer said:

"Well, what's the matter with that bug pin? What do you think?"

"Vell, Mr. Balmer," said the German, "I don'd know but vat I never before saw so big a bug on so schmall a pototo," and he walked off with a queer grin on his face.

The remark struck Mr. Palmer as being exceedingly funny, and he told it to some of his friends.—Harrisburg (Pa.) Telegraph.

Starred Into Demanding Tips.

From the New York Graphic.

"I want you to notice the change I get," said a friend who was dining at the Hoffman House. "It is sure to come that no matter what the size of the bank bill I send to the cashier's desk, my change will come back in such shape that a quarter can be put aside for the waiter." Handing up a $5 note to pay a bill of $2 even, he received back one $2 bill, a 50-cent piece and two quarters. "Now, I'll show you something more," said the gentleman, as he ordered two pousse cafes and two cigars, for which the bill was 75 cents. "This waiter will not expect another quarter on this order, but he will bring back the change so that I can give him 10 cents." Sure enough, the change brought back was two 10-cent pieces and a nickle. The gentleman concluded: "Now, that is general all over New York. The waiter is given barely starvation wages, with the understanding that he can make it up in tips."

200,000 ACRES
In farms of 160 acres and upward. These lands were located by the Company among the earliest, with especial care as to soil, timber and water. They are adapted to the growth of cotton, corn, oats, wheat, barley, rye, vegetables, orchards and gardens and the various domestic grasses.
Situated in the elevated and healthy region known as the Southern Panhandle of Texas, they possess a genial climate, favorable to man and beast, where outdoor work can be carried on the year round, and are in marked contrast with regions of early and late frosts or of destructive "blizzards."
Population is fast pouring in, and local government is already established, with schools, churches, &c.
TERMS OF SALE: One-fifth cash, balance in four equal yearly payments, with interest on deferred payments.
For further information as to these said lands to adjacent counties, apply to
J. S. NAPIER, Vernon, Texas,

A PROMINENT MERCHANT IN TROUBLE.

Old moneybags mopes in his office all day,
As snappish and cross as a bear;
The clerks know enough to keep out of his way,
Lest the merchant should grumble and swear.
Even Tabby, the cat, is in fear of a cuff,
Or a kick, if she ventures too near;
They all know the master is apt to be rough,
And his freaks unexpected and queer.

What makes the old fellow so surly and grim,
And behave so confoundedly mean?
There's certainly something the matter with him—
Is it stomach, or liver, or spleen?
We've guessed it—his liver is sluggish and bad,
His blood is disordered and foul.
It's enough to make any one hopelessly mad,
And greet his best friend with a growl.

To correct a sluggish or disordered liver, and to cleanse and purify the blood and thereby sweeten the temper, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has no equal. It improves digestion, builds up the flesh, invigorates the system, dispells melancholy, and makes life worth living.

IT IS GUARANTEED to benefit or cure, if taken in time and given a fair trial, in all diseases for which it is recommended, or the money paid for it will be refunded.

DAKOTA'S GREAT BLIZZARD.

Incidents of the Meteorological Terror Told by a Government School-Teacher.

As the time for blizzards comes round again, says a writer in the Atlantic Monthly, I propose to invite the club to meet at our camp, Rosebud agency, southern Dakota. To prepare the minds of the members let me recall our experience of last January. We knew before we got out of bed, in this little government school-house, that the most awful storm we had ever witnessed was imminent. The sky was inky. In a few minutes the storm began, and in half an hour from this time it was at its height. Lilia ventured a few yards out of the front door at its beginning and was near not getting back. The wind struck her with such violence as to bring her head down to a level with her knees and take away her breath. She said she was near falling on her face, and she knew that if she fell she would not get up again. She got to the house, bent at the angle into which the wind had forced her. The storm raged without one moment's abatement or lull during the whole day and far into the night when we fell asleep. At first the little frame building creaked and shivered like a ship at sea, and we wondered how anything constructed by the hand of man could stand against that wind. After the first half-hour it was impossible to distinguish the sound of groaning timbers, for the ears were filled with the rush of the elements. It was like the roar and surging of a mighty ocean.

Being in the house we could see out a few yards on one side—the side from which the storm did not come. On the other three sides the snow beat and came in (though the house is close and tight), and went half way across the school-room. It hung in a beautiful fringe, several inches long, from the drying rope stretched across the room, and festooned the maps on the walls and finally blocked up the windows till they were as impeneterable as snow banks.

It was a comfort to us to believe, as we then did, that this greatest of all blizzards had set in as early in other camps as in ours, and that no human being was exposed to its fury. No sun had risen over our heads on that day and we had rung no school bell; we could not know that bells were ringing from many a prairie school-house and that the fair promise of the day was luring men, women, and children to their doom.

On the afternoon preceding this destructive day no snow fell, but the force of the wind was so great that it lifted up from the boundless prairie the accumulated drifts of weeks and carried them along in great waves, so that the whole earth seemed in motion and rising heavenward. The outline of these vast billows and the intervening troughs, as seen against the horizon, was the most impressive sight that had ever met my eyes.

On the morning of the 13th the mercury registered 25 degrees below zero and the wind was blowing cruelly. The drifts between us and the village were so deep that we thought it unsafe to ring for the children. But they came over the half mile, through drifts waist deep to large children, and the two faithful policemen, Stiff Arm and Cut Foot, came to see how we had got through the blizzard.

The school-room was not to be thought of on that bitter day, and we brought the children and the policemen into our bedroom to thaw out. We run the mercury up to 110 degrees within two feet of the stove; at a distance of eight feet it was 95 degrees lower. Not one of the children uttered a sound of complaint, but the big tears rolled silently down the swollen cheeks of one of the little girls when the genial warmth of the room began to make her comfortable.

Our fifteen-mile-off neighbor, the young teacher at the camp, stepped in one evening to ask if we could give him a bed for the night. He had been trying all day to get to his camp and had consumed four hours in traveling one mile and a half. His plucky little Indian pony dragged the wagon through the heavy drifts by main force, the wheels not turning and the horse waddling where he could not walk. The sheet of ice inclosed his nose and an icicle more than a foot long hung from it. This gentle animal during the blizzard of the 12th not only broke his halter, but pawed down a thick stable door with hinges a foot long. His master went out into the storm to see how he was faring. He spent two hours in looking for him, though he was only a few yards from him. When found he was a mass of ice, his eyes nearly closed by it, and a giant icicle hanging from his nose.

Mr. Warner's own eye-lashes froze every time he winked and he had to hold his hand to his face and send the hot breath up to them before he could open them again. We hear this is common enough in Dakota, but we don't stay out long enough to wink.

Before the Compass Was Invented.

The statement that the compass was invented by Flavio Gioia, or Fra Diavolo, or some other Dutchman, has long since been declared erroneous. As early as 1268 Pierre de Maricourt not only described the compass, but calculated its variations, and the calculation shows that the needle wobbled with as much certainty then as it does now. Paul must have been familiar with the compass, for we are told that he "fetched a compass." We are not told, however, where he feched it from, or why he hadn't it on board when he started.

In the time of Homer it was regarded as a great exploit to make a short sea voyage. The expedition of Jason was lost in a dense black fog which had blown over from London. Jason, it will be remembered, went after the golden fleece and got it; but nowadays men go overland to Wall street to get fleeced. The voyagers prayed lustily to Apollo to yank them out of the fog. He was too dignified to do that, and so he got astraddle of a rock and lighted them to an island with the brightness of his bow. This little incident subsequently suggested the lighting of New York harbor by the Goddess of Liberty.

When Flock, the famous Norwegian navigator, sailed from Shetland to Gardarshoim (now Iceland) he took on board three or four crows, which he liberated at intervals, only to see them return to the ship. Finally one of them saw land ahead. It flew thither, and Flock followed it, and crows go about in flocks ever since. Arngrim Jonas tells us this story, and the mere fact that he isn't here to verify it restrains us from intimating that he revamped it from the account of the dove and the ark.

In 874 Ingolf, another Norwegian adventurer, sailed for Iceland. In order to carry out a supersition of the country he threw overboard a wooden god, hoping to land on the coast whither it guided him. But the wooden god wooden oblige him, and was swept out of sight by the current. Ingolf swore furiously in Norwegian, for which reason it no doubt wasn't written up against him, and landed on that part of the island which still bears his name.

The ancient coins Phocæa have a picture of seal upon them, commemorative of the leading event in the history of the colony. The ships, having no other guide, followed a shoal of seals. The emigrants reached the coast and founded Phocæa or Sealtown. The first industry which they established was the manufacture of sealskin sacques, thus becoming responsible for a great deal of our modern domestic infelicity.

Aristophanes tells us, in a couplet, that the Greek mariners derived omens from the birds:

"From birds in sailing men instruction take;
Now lie in port, now sail, and profit make."

The learned author might have added that men lie considerably when not in port, and that the fuller of port they are the more they lie. It was regarded by sailors as a bad omen to see but one magpie on the coast; but if they saw two they would at once set sail. The magpie may be a gad-about, but she has more common sense to the square inch than the crow, the seal or the wooden god to which reference has been made. She isn't going to trail her skirts through the mud or have the feathers on her bonnet put out of curl by a storm. She prefers to attend to her incubating and other housework, while her husband puts on his oilskin coat and arctics and hustels around for food for both of them. When the air is warm they take a promenade together, pretty sure that the eggs will not be chilled during the interval. Anyhow, Sir Davy Humphrey explains it in that way, and Davy had a notable head.—Detroit Free Press.

Filling Bombshells.

Forty civilian workmen accustomed to the manipulation of explosive substances are at present employed at Toulon Arsenal, under the direction of the artillery staff, in charging melenite shells. To the latter composition, it appears, is now added another substance called "cresilite," which is stated to materially increase the power of melenite, and at the same time contribute to its preservation and safety in handling. As fast as the shells are loaded, and a considerable number are daily filled, they are sent away to store at the forts on the coast or Alpine line. The process of filling the shells is supposed to be a secret, but it is learned that the cresilite, a hard gummy, compound, is first melted in copper vessles, and then poured into a space occupying about two-thirds of the interior of the shell left in the casting. The remaining vacuum is afterward fitted up with melenite, rammed in by means of a mallet, and the work requires the utmost delicacy. Ten men are especially selected for the latter part of the operation, who are kept separated one from the other in compartments enclosed by walls of empty shells, so that should an explosion occur, there would be but one victim.

On beginning work in the morning the fillers have to drink a pint of milk, by medical order, as a prophylactic remedy against the noxious fumes of the substances they handle, which leave upon all the exposed parts of their skins a deep yellow tinge that cannot be removed, even by continuous ablutions. In spite, however, of these cutaneous signs and forebodings of the surgeons, men, who gain from 4 shillings to 6 shillings per day, seem to retain excellent health and declare that the emanations from the compounds they mix endow them with inordinate appetites.—Broad Arrow.

THEY SLANT IN THAT DIRECTION.

To tell w'y men is so an' so
 Is much too hard for me;
It is the way the critters grow,
 That makes them what they be
I only say the reason w'y
So many men is all awry,
 An' full of imperfection,
Is simply jest because they can
Git any other kind of slant—
 They slant in thet direction.

I do not try to make it plain
 W'y men are proud or meek;
Or with a mighty sweep er brain
 Or vast expanse er check;
It is enough fer me to know
It is the way the critters grow,
 In every town an' section;
There is some power that gives a cant,
Some mighty "skid" that makes them slant,
 All slant in thet direction.

An' I don't blame men overmuch
 An' on their vices rant,
'Till I look up their traits an' such
 To fin' the way they slant;
An' I won't smite 'em hip an j'int
Until I find the way they pint,
 Nor scold each imperfection:
A little cherity I'll grant,
For men are bad because they slant—
 They slant in thet direction.

CHAPTER I.

They say I am mad. Mad! But no, I am not. I am as sane as any man. It is brooding over my troubles that brings the wild, and at times, vacant look into my eyes, and causes me to sometimes rend my clothing into shreds and lacerate my flesh, or at times sit for hours doing nothing but think, think, think.

Then I sleep. But O, the specters that haunt my feverish dreams. They are ten-fold more terrible than those that torture my poor brain during my waking hours.

But it will soon be over. I can feel that my days are already numbered. But he will come before that. Yes, I feel, I know he will come. I cannot die before I meet him face to face.

Ha, ha! My revenge will be sweet. I'll awaken his pity, and then I'll lead him on and on until I get him in some secluded spot, and then I'll throttle him, I'll strangle the treacherous, lying life out of his body and leave it for the crows and buzzards to quarrel over.

People will think it was highwaymen who, but pish! what care I for their thoughts or suspicions? Even though they detect me in the act, what matters that? True, they might hang me. Hang me, ha ha! The death of Looney Jim would be a great atonement for the crime of murder. And the murder of the squire of Mansfield Grange, too.

Squire! Sitting in a high place. Honorable. With four-in-hand, servants, money and what not. I wonder if he still remembers that day so long ago. Not long, either, for I am only 36, it was just ten years ago last Easter. I wonder if he remembers how he wronged me with his devilish scheming, but ah-h, I dare not recall that. I—I should become excited, and then comes one of those long periods of vacancy, the occurrences in which I strive in vain to recall.

As I sit and think my mind begins to turn my life pages backward. I become retrospective. Well, let it be so.

So long ago! So long ago! But still I remember it so well. It was on a bright May morning that sweet Nellie Forrester, God bless her, promised to be mine. Mine! what a fond recollection, and for such a short time.

We were married in the following September. O, those long, dreamy, blissful summer days, when we wandered through the leafy woods hand in hand, building ethereal castles for the future. We would not dwell in the haughty old stone castle-like structure—mine, the last of the grand old race of Van Martyne, by right of descent—overlooking the estate, but we would have a bright, cheery little cottage near the edge of the forest, where my darling could always hear the birds warble their sweetest morning songs, and where the fragrant wild flowers shed their perfume upon the summer air. A pair of love-sick ninnies, the people called us when they learned our intentions, but we were too happy to give heed to their seemingly envious chatter. Our little nest was completed but never occupied. Amid the pleasing clamor of our wedding we departed for London, but after a brief stay, we came home, accompanied by a host of friends, and the old stone mansion on the hill was the scene of gay festivities all that winter and spring.

Then the unseen cloud began to form. O, that at such periods in our lives we might have the occult gift of foresight. But perhaps it is better as it is. It is not for me to say. We were so happy for a few short months—it seems at times to be but a dream.

In the following summer we accepted an invitation to spend the autumn at Mansfield Grange, ——shire, the house of Sir Charles Wedhurst.

Charles Wedhurst—Sir Charles! How that name burns into my memory, obliterating everything else. How plainly his image rises before me now, causing the hot words of hate to surge over my soul and blot out my little remaining reason. Yet he was fair to look upon. Tall and slender, with rosy cheeks, blue eyes, and a dainty moustache sweeping either cheek, combined with a natural facinating presence, he was the seeming embodiment of all manly attributes—a man to win and delight or break a woman's heart. But what a face and form Satan often chooses to mask his evil designs. For Sir Charles Wedhurst made me what I now am a friendless outcast Looney Jim, they call me, a butt for the stupid jests of all the lower class for miles around. But patience, they do not know all, and they are often kind to me in their rough way.

I now believe that the first time Sir Charles saw my wife his hellish design found its inception. He danced, he walked, he rode and drove with her, in fact he was her constant attendant while at our home during the winter. Fool that I was! I was so blinded with my own happiness that I never suspected his infatuation, but I can clearly see it now. But was not Sir Charles Wedhurst conceded to be the soul of honor? I trusted him.

On the day which marked the first anniversary of our marriage, I kissed my wife good-bye and started for a ride about the estate in company with Sir Charles. The horses we bestrode were magnificent spirited creatures, and we were soon going across the fields at a rattling pace. I was slightly in advance of Sir Charles when I came to a high wall, and my mount, in the attempt to clear it, fell heavily, carrying me with him. I heard a confused murmur of voices and then all was a blank.

Then followed what seemed to me a long horrible dream. When I awoke I was in a dark close room, lying on a a hard cot. I attempted to arise, but in so doing I rolled out on to the floor. The sound of my fall brought an attendant to the spot, and he seized me and called for aid. A tall gray-bearded benevolent looking old man walked in. "He is going to have another violent attack," whispered the attendant. "No, I think not," was the reply, and I was taken into a lighted apartment and subjected to a close scrutiny. My appearance was evidently satisfactory, for the attendant disappeared at a sign, and I found myself alone with the old gentleman, who I instinctively felt to be a physician. He led me back to my cot, and spoke to me in a soothing manner, bidding me to keep still. He then gave me a sort of potion to drink, and I fell asleep.

When I awoke the old physician sat by my side watching me closely. I felt much better, and was allowed to arise. The first thing I asked was how long I had been ill and where Sir Charles was. The answer I received, O, merciful heaven, was that Sir Charles had just married Lady Marlyn and gone abroad! Then I was informed that I dad just recovered rational consciousness from an injury to my brain, the effects of which had extended over a period of nearly four years! I sat dazed for an instant, and then my senses again forsook me. I remember that I frantically proclaimed my identity and begged and implored on my knees that I might be set at liberty at once that I might follow and reclaim my wife, my lost darling, but to no avail. Then followed what I now know was a year of darkness.

When I again recovered consciousness I feigned quiet and forgetfulness of what had occurred. Visitors to the asylum—for such it was—were informed that I was a poor unforunate, treated and cared for at the expense of Sir Charles Wedhurst, but that I imagined I was Sir Henry Marlyn. And the visitors would shake their heads and exclaim "poor fellow!" as they turned away.

I was extremely quiet for several months, while all the time I was being consumed by the most exquisite inward torment. Finally I was discharged as cured, and I quitted the spot forever. I turned my steps toward my old home, and finally reached that spot where years before I had dwelt respected and beloved, but now—

CHAPTER II.

Up to this time I had no suspicion of the dastardly trick of which Sir Charles had been guilty, but it was suddenly revealed to me like a thunder clap. In a dim way I grasped the idea that it would be worse than folly for me to proclaim my identity, and so I held my peace, impatiently awaiting Sir Charles' home coming, when I confidently felt that I would be recognized and all would be well. The people of the neighborhood were very kind to me in their humble way, and I never wanted for food or shelter.

One evening in my wanderings about the Marlyn estate—a spirit of unusual restlessness seemed to pervade me that evening—I chanced to drop into the cottage of a neighbor who was very kindly disposed toward me, and by whose fireside I could always find an ungrudged seat. There I overheard a conversation which rehearsed the details of the accident by which Sir Henry Van Marlyn was supposed to have lost his life. As I sat and listened the truth flashed across my mind, and I was rooted to my seat in speechless horror.

I heard how Sir Charles, close behind me when my horse fell, had sprang to my assistance raised me up, and endeavored to restore me to consciousness, but all to no avail. I was dead. Just then an escaped madman, pursued by two keepers, sprang out of the wood near by, and with a club had in his insane fury, knocked Sir Charles senseless and mutilated me beyond all recognition. The lunatic fled upon the approach of some farm hands who had witnessed the catastrophe, and who resuscitated Sir Charles and assisted in bearing my corpse home. My wife was almost killed by the shock, but Sir Charles had been a constant and unwearied attendant and sympathizer, and touched by his unwearied devotion she had married him about four years after my supposed death.

A full comprehension of Sir Charles' machinations then broke upon me. Tempted by the beauty of my wife he had plotted to kill me and then win her for himself. He had given me a high-strung, nettlesome horse to ride and headed me toward a wall that no living horse could clear. His scheme worked to perfection. As he had anticipated I was severely stunned by the fall, and the mutilated corpse of an unknown outcast had been substituted for my insensible form, and taken home to my grief-stricken wife, while I had been hurried away by paid tools, to a distant asylum, where I was incarcerated as an unknown vagrant, and had been made a subject of experiment by a well-known specialist on insanity. Full well did Sir Charles know how to play upon my wife's sympathies, and, worn out by constant pleadings, no donbt, had married him.

Unable to hear the comments being expressed I arose and groped my way out of doors. My brain seemed on fire. For a long time—it must have been weeks—I wandered, I know not whither, escaping re-incarceration in an asylum by that peculiar cunning which divine Providence alone can give to those afflicted as I was. When I came again to myself, properly speaking, I was in a hut on the land belonging to Mansfield Grange, and here I have since remained subsisting upon the charity of the community—the last of a race, once the foremost in the land. Formerly the humiliation would have caused me to destroy myself, but now I must live for revenge. I have written this in my calmer moods, when the memory of my past life has not caused the hot waves of passion to run riot in my being and cast a veil over my feeble understanding. Here I live as Looney Jim; and so will I die. To him only will I make myself known.

* * * * * * * *

The time is drawing near when I shall meet him face to face. Yesterday I noticed preparations for an unusual event going on at the Grange, and upon inquiry found that the master—Sir Charles!—was expected home in a few days to spend the winter after several years' absence. Then—oh-h! but I must be calm—I must control myself.

* * * * * * * *

At last—at last! The time is near at hand! To-day while walking in the wood near the Grange I met him. How did I manage to restrain myself? I know not. Surely I did not betray myself! No, for he seemed to pity my forlorn condition, and inquired my residence, and promised to call upon me with a view to assisting me in some manner. How he has changed! He looks old, Crow-feet show themselves about his eyes, and he is slightly bowed forward, as though age was creeping upon him. His once jaunty, buoyous manner is gone, and he seems to have a worried expression. Ah! dearly purchased happiness! Is he pursued by remorse? Perhaps—no, he cannot. It is too late to atone for the past, and yet, if I thought my darling was happy I might, but I must go where the air will cool my poor heated brain. I—I feel the spell coming on. I cannot forget the past!

The following paragraph, printed under flaring headlines, was printed in the London Trumpeter of Dec. —18—:

"A Sad Home Coming.—It is our painful task to announce the death by violence on Thursday evening last, of Sir Charles Wedhurst, of Mansfield Grange, ——shire, who returned home on Tuesday after a prolonged absence abroad. He had gone out in the evening, presumably for a walk, and as he did not return a search was instituted, and he was found at a late hour lying in a secluded grove with his throat encircled by the fingers of a man who was also dead. The latter person was recognized as a weak-minded nondescript, familiarly known as "Looney Jim," who had for several years past been living in a small cottage near the Grange, and subsisting upon the charity of the neighbors. He was known to have violent fits of insanity at times, but as he usually shut himself up in his hut during such attacks he was considered harmless. It is probable that he met Sir Charles in one of his violent moods, and thinking him an enemy attacked him with fatal results. The ground about the bodies bore evidence of a terrible struggle. The bodies were removed to a dwelling near by, and the sad news broken as gently as possible to Lady Medhurst. She was much affected, and insisted upon being at once taken to where Sir Charles lay. When she entered the room she gazed wildly at the bodies, and suddenly threw up her hands and shrieked "My God! my husband"! and fell to the floor in a death-like swoon. She recovered shortly, only to go from one swoon into another, and serious effects are to be feared, as she is of a rather delicate constitution. It is said that the maniac's features as they lay in quiet repose, bore a startling resemblance to the late Sir Henry Van Marlyn. Lady Wedhurst's first husband, who met with such a tragic death several years ago, this unfortunate resemblance may have had much to do with the prostration of Lady Wedhurst, combined with the violent death of Sir Charles, which must have recalled the former event with only too startling force.

Later—Lady Wedhurst died this afternoon while unconscious.

Use Sealing Wax if You are a Swell.

Some new letter paper has appeared of the same grass-green as the blotting books, though for the rest cream-white stationery is preferred to colored. Bright tints, however, are lavished on the monogram, crest or pictoral decorations on the paper, the sheets of which are made at once broader and shorter than formerly, the envelopes being no longer square, but oblong, so as to accommodate this shaped sheet folded once. Great efforts are being made by the French stationers to bring sealing-wax into vogue, and we are informed that no letter-writer who respects himself or herself should use adhesive envelopes. So far, however, the fashion spreads but slowly. It takes time and trouble to seal a letter, and in these telegraphic days we are sparing of both. That seals should come in along with cameos and fobs is but natural, and, given the seal, the wax will perhaps be used as a matter of course. London Queen.

When Errors are Excellent.

A Baltimore paper is praising Mark Twain's "delightful drawl."

This is just what might have been expected. Nothing is more disagreeable than the drawling utterance of an unknown man, but in one who is successful and famous, it is, as our contemporary says, simply delightful.

When the average man fails to pronounce common words correctly, people laugh at him, but Walter Savage Landor's barbarous pronunciation, the like of which will never be heard on earth again, was generally admired.

It is so with a man's dress, manners and habits—the crucial test is his status in the word. The younger generation understand this thoroughly and the only maxim now quoted is that of the cynical Frenchman—"Nothing succeeds like success."—Atlantic Constitution.

Snakes in Bundles.

In the eastern part of Sullivan county, N. Y., many sections of the country are comparatively wild, and bears, wildcats, red deer and poisonous reptiles abound, but here in the western part, the wilderness had been turned into a garden, and the wild animals that used to run at large hereabout have retreated to more favorable quartes.

The good old hunting days of former times are dwelt upon lovingly ancient nimrods here, and, in fact, Jeffersonvilleites have just been dying for a sensation such as eastern Sullivan county people continually enjoy.

During one of the warm, sunshiny days recently, Aaron Bentley, residing near here, made preparations for a "leetle spring plantin'." Bentley's son was set to work to remove some big stones out of a field before ploughing. The boy was about to roll over a big rock, when he suddenly set up screaming and ran pell-mell toward his father and a couple of field hands. "A snake! a snake!" shouted the lad. "And it was 10 feet long," he continued.

The three men, followed by the boy ran toward the spot designated, and sure enough, not only one, but three immense snakes lay sunning themselves near the rock. Two of the reptiles were rattlers, but they were in a half-dormant condition, and consequently harmless.

The third snake appeared to be of the black species, though it was curiously mottled and had a tremendous head. The three snakes were killed and the big stone was rolled away. Underneath was found a great, slimy, half-dead-and-alive mass of snakes. They were laced and interlocked together in a curious and artistic net work. At least six different varieties of reptiles were taking their winter's sleep peacefully together.

The warm, spring-like days had revivified many of them, and when disturbed by blows and pokes they set up a lively hissing and wriggling. Mr. Bently says that not less than a hundred snakes were killed, and his word is considered "of great account" here.

One of the farm hands called "Jake" is willing to "swar on me heart" that 500 of the "tarnal critters wuz beat inter kingdom come," while Bentley's son and heir is giving it out that "Me an' dad killed 1,000 rattlesnakes yisday out in the 10-acre lot."

An inmate of the penitentiary at Salem, Oregon, cut off his hand in order to get a spell of idleness. On his way to the penitentiary a few weeks ago he told the officer that he did not intend working while in jail. He was assigned to the foundry and on the first day burned his foot. Afterwards he asserted he was sick, and when this was found not to be the case he mutilated himself. He used a hatchet and made two blows at the hand before he accomplished his purpose. The penitentiary doctor says the man is not insane.

A very pretty incident occured at Athens, Ga., the other day. At an afternoon prayer meeting held at a private house, as a hymn was being sung, a little canary bird joined in with the singing, and continued his soft, mellow notes until the song had been finished.

March April May

Are the best months in which to purify your blood, for at no other season does the system so much need the aid of a reliable medicine like Hood's Sarsaparilla, as now. During the long, cold winter, the blood becomes thin and impure, the body becomes weak and tired, the appetite may be lost. Hood's Sarsaparilla is peculiarly adapted to purify and enrich the blood, to create a good appetite and to overcome that tired feeling. It increases in popularity every year, for it is the ideal spring medicine.

"Every spring for years I have made it a practice to take from three to five bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla, because I know it purifies the blood and thoroughly cleanses the system of all impurities. That languid feeling, sometimes called 'spring fever,' will never visit the system that has been properly cured for by this never-failing remedy." W. H. Lawrence, Editor Agricultural Epitomist, Indianapolis, Ind.

CONGRESSIONAL.

Weekly Resume of the Proceedings of the Senate and House.

Saturday, Feb. 16.

SENATE.—Senator Davis introduced a bill in the Senate for the relief of James Healy, of Minnesota, for $406.23, for balance due him on a mail contract.

HOUSE.—The house took up the postoffice bill. Mr. Holman offered an amendment providing that the aggregate salaries of postoffice clerks as fixed by the new classification shall not exceed the sum appropriated by the bill ($6,550,000.). The amendment was adopted after a brief debate in which Mr. Peters (Rep.) of Kansas characterized the civil service law as the froth of political economy, the morass of political honesty and the excelsior of political hypocrisy. Mr. Kerr of Iowa moved to strike out the clause relative to assistant postmasters. Adjourned.

The ways and means committee reported favorably the following bill of Mr. Rice's, amending section 2506, of the Revised Statutes: "And the produce of the forest of the State of Minnesota on the Rainey Lake river and the Lake of the Wood and their tributaries, owned by American citizens and sawed in the Provinces of Ontario and Manitoba by American citizens, the same being in part unmanufactured, shall be admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty, under such regulations as the secretary of the treasury shall from time to time prescribe."

Monday Feb. 18.

SENATE:—The house bill to provide for taking the eleventh and the subsequent censuses passed the senate to-day.

The senate committee on territories reported favorably the Springer bill to organize the Territory of Oklahoma.

In the senate Mr. Vest entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report on the direct tax bill was agreed to Saturday. This hangs the bill up temporarily and may result in its defeat.

HOUSE.—In the house Mr. Crisp called up the California election case of Sullivan against Felton, against which Mr. McKenna of California raised the question of consideration. The Republicans filibustered and prevented any action being taken before adjournment.

The house recommitted the bill for the protection of the fur seal fisheries in Alaska, with instructions to the committee on merchant marine and fisheries to report it back with an amendment reducing from twenty to ten years the term of the lease of the seal fisheries, and authorizing any person to bring suit against the lessees to recover $10 for every seal taken in excess of the number fixed by law.

Under the terms of the Indian appropriation bill, the St. Benedict academy in Stearns county and St. Paul's industrial school at Clontarf, Minn., secure the education of 100 Chippewa boys and girls at $150 per year apiece. The new Indian industrial school at Pierre, Dak., is given $175 for each Indian child educated. The superintendent is to be paid $1,500 per year. Thirty five thousand dollars will go into Pierre next year for fitting out the school and for the support of pupils.

The bill reported favorably from the committee on ways and means allowing timber cut in Northern Minnesota to be taken over into Manitoba to be sawed and then returned duty free was at one time reported adversely upon by the secretary of the treasury, who maintains that such legislation would open the door for gigantic frauds on the revenue, which he believed had been perpetrated in Maine. Mr. Nelson took the matter up, however, and showed the secretary in a letter written last year that there was no timber in Manitoba to be smuggled in.

The Sioux bill in its amended condition has reached the senate, and has gone to the committee on Indian affairs. It is not known whether Mr. Dawes will report it, as his own bill, which was introduced some time ago, contains also a submission clause. The following clause in the Indian appropriation bill will show the manner in which the house committee expects to bring the Sioux to time:

"That the secretary of the interior shall cause a census of the Sioux tribe of Indians to be carefully taken by a special agent to be appointed for such purpose, with a view of ascertaining how many of them are able to support themselves, and in ascertaining this fact their physical capacity to work the land owned or occupied by them, either individually or collectively, the value of the land, its nearness to market and general productiveness shall be considered, and such other facts and circumstances as will aid congress in determining how many of such Indians are capable of self-support. And after such census has been taken only those Indians that are found to be unable to support themselves by reasonable exercise shall receive rations from the government of the United States."

Tuesday, Feb. 19.

SENATE.—Mr. Harris, in the senate, called attention to the large number of unconfirmed nominations. He held it to be as much the duty of the president to make nominations to fill official vacancies as to perform any other official duty, and as much the duty of the senate to consider and confirm or reject such nominations as to performance of the senatorial duty. He moved that the senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The motion was rejected by a party vote—yeas 24, nays, 26.

Mr. Harris—I shall give the senate an opportunity to vote on this motion every day to the end of the session.

Mr. Edmunds (ironically)—That is right.

HOUSE.—In the house, Mr. Caswell submitted the conference report on the bill to repay the direct tax. Democratic members thereupon filibustered, and Mr. Caswell withdrew the matter from the consideration of the house, announcing that he would call it up to-morrow. In the senate, Mr. Vest's motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report on the direct tax bill was agreed to, was rejected—8 to 43. There is a suspicion in the minds of the friends of the bill that the lively opposition in the house to the reception of the conference report on that that bill, and the filibustering against its consideration, were the result of an intimation from the president that he would prefer not to have to choose between the approval of the bill or a direct veto. If action on the bill is delayed beyond to-morrow, or if there should be a failure on the part of the senate committee on enrollment bill to deliver the bill to the president before next Thursday, the president may avail himself of the constitutional right to hold the bill ten days, which would carry it over the 4th of March, when it could not be signed, and would therefore fail.

Representative Laffoon, from the committee on expenditures in the war department, reported to the house a substitute for the bill introduced by Representative C. R. Breckinridge, providing for the creation in the war department of a bureau of harbors and waterways to undertake all river and harbor improvements. The substitute provides for the creation of such a department to be officered by a corps of United States civil engineers, composed of an equal number of military officers and civilians.

Wednesday Feb. 20.

SENATE.—Congress has done all it can do for the four northern territories, and did it at the last frankly and graciously. The report of the conference committee was agreed to by both houses this afternoon, by the house of representatives in fifteen minutes without a division and by the senate after an hour of senseless debate. Also without a roll call. It now goes to the president for his signature.

The president to-day sent to congress all the correspondence which has taken place between this government and the government of Great Britain in regard to the dismissal of Lord Sackville West as minister of Great Britain to the United States. Most of the correspondence has already been published.

The senate committee on Indian affair held a meeting to consider the Sioux bill passed by the house some days ago. A conclusion was reached and the bill will be reported to-morrow and passed by the senate. Few changes were made in the bill except that the Indian Defense association got in its work to a considerable extent and the Sioux are to have $11,000 000 cold cash as an indictment toward giving their consent to the opening of the reservation.

HOUSE:—The postponement of the election of congressmen in the new states until the first Tuesday in October may have no important bearing upon the call for an extra session. Those who are opposed to an extra session will insist that it will be inexpedient to attempt to organize the house and to enter upon the transaction of important business with a scanty majority, when it is pretty certain that by the election in these new states the Republican membership of the house will be increased by four if not by five. On the other hand those who are insisting upon the necessity of an extra session maintain the fact that the seven new members who are to be admitted to congress after October will not remove the risks attending a narrow majority before that time, and that it might happen that there would be some delay in organizing the new states or in obtaining admission for the new members. In other words, many of the most prominent Republicans insist that it is necessary for the Republicans to reorganize the house at the earliest possible opportunity, so as to provide against the hazard of the loss of organization by death or otherwise.

The house committe on agriculture decided to report adversely a bill to punish dealing in futures in agricultural products: also a bill to prohibit fictitious and gambling transactions on the price of articles produced by American farm industry. The object of these bills is to stop grain gambling on the public exchanges and boards of trade.

Thursday Feb. 21.

SENATE.—As was stated to be a possibility when the bill passed, the president to-day vetoed the bill for the relief of settlers upon the Des Moines river lands. The present measure was drawn upon lines supposed to meet objections which were urged on in the president's last veto message sent to the Fortyninth congress, but it seems that those objections can in no way be met.

In the senate the committee on public buildings and grounds reported a resolution directing the president of the senate to issue his warrant commanding the sergeant-at-arms forthwith to arrest and bring to the bar of the senate Thomas D. Fister to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. Mr. Morgan, remarking that the resolution presented some delicate points of law, objected to its present consideration, and it went over. Fister is the employe of the supervising architect's office who refused to answer the question as to the collection in the office of money for political purposes.

The senate committee on Indian affairs today reported favorably the house bill opening the Sioux reservation. The Pine Ridge reservation was changed as to its boundaries so as to make its lower boundary the northern edge of Pass creek on the White river, as it appeared in the original bill the tribal patent arrangement was wiped out and the regular submission clause is inserted in section 16. The amount of land required for station purposes by the railroads is fixed at twenty acres in place of the indefinite terms fixed in the house bill. The amendment offered by La Follette of Wisconsin in relation to the buildings to be placed upon the grounds granted by the railroads, which was defeated in the house, was placed in the bill by the committee. The amount of money to be paid each Indian is raised from $20 to $50.

HOUSE.—Mr. Randall introduced in the house a resolution which instructs the committee on rules to report a rule, the purport of which is that the house shall proceed to consider the vote upon the Cowles bill to abolish the tax on tobacco and that no filibustering motions shall be entertained by the speaker to prevent. This resolution, after some ineffectual opposition on the part of the free trade members of the committee on ways and means, was referred to the committee on rules. The proposed rule will be reported. It happens that on this committee the free traders are in the minority. The committee consists of Carlisle, Mills and Randall, Democrats, and of Reed and Cannon, Republicans. Mr. Randall will vote with the two Republicans, and the rule will be reported forthwith.

Friday, Feb. 22.

SENATE.—The senate passed the sundry civil and agricultural appropriation bills.

Mr. Reagan offered in the senate a petition of Gen. Daniel Ruggles of Fredericksburg, Va., praying for an appropriation of $100,000 to be expended in developing his system of producing rainfall and resisting cyclones and tornadoes.

Senator Stanford introduced a proposed amendment to the army appropriation bill, authorizing the secretary of war to purchase four pneumatic dynamite guns of 15-inch caliber, and the necessary machinery to fire and handle the same, together with the necessary ammunition and cartridges, to be located in the harbor of San Francisco, the cost not to exceed $250,000. In a letter to the senator, Secretary Edincott approves of the location of these guns in the harbor of San Francisco.

The senate adopted an amendment to the sundry civil bill which declares Tuesday, April 3, 1889, the anniversary of the inauguration of the first president of the United States, George Washington, a national holiday throughout the United States; provides for the assembling of both houses in the hall of the house of representatives on the second Wednesday of December, 1889, when, under an arrangement by a joint committee, ceremonies are to be had in further commemoration of that historic event; authorizes the joint committee to sit during the recess and to invite the officers of the United States and of the respective states and representatives of foreign governments to attend, and also to invite the chief justice to deliver an address on the occasion, and appropriates $3,000 to defray the expenses of the joint committee and of carrying out its arrangements.

HOUSE.—The house amendments to the senate bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi river at Alma, Wis., was concurred in by the senate.

The house took up the senate bill for retirement of Gen. W. S. Rosecrans with the rank of brigadier general. The bill was vigorously opposed by Mr. Struble of Iowa, on the ground that Gen. Rosecrans had vilified Gen. Grant and had declared Grant was a scoundrel. This man who had vilified the country's hero came here to-day and asked for aid without a word of apology or without showing that he had changed his opinion. Mr. Anderson of Iowa said that at one time he had felt, in consequence of an attack made by Gen. Rosecrans upon Gen. Grant, that he could never forgive Gen. Rosecrans. But he had changed with time and he had come to the conclusion that the manly thing to do, in view of the great infirmities of human nature which attached to the greatest heroes, was to vote for this bill. Mr. Perkins of Kansas said a few years ago Gen. Rosecrans had stood on this floor and opposed the Grant bill, saying that he did so on principle, and that it was wrong to enlarge the retired list for the benefit of those who had gone into private walks of life. Applying that principle to his own case, he (Mr. Perkins) could not see how Gen. Rosecrans could ask for the pending legislation. At Chickamauga, had it not been for Gen. Thomas, who formed a wall against which the rebel forces broke themselves, Gen. Rosecrans' name would have gone down to dishonor. After further debate the bill was passed.

Archimedes at the Lever.

We apologize for mistakes made in all former issues and say they were inexcusable, as all an editor has to do is to hunt news, and clean the rollers, and set type, and sweep the floor, and pen short items, and fold papers, and write wrappers, and make the paste, and mail the papers, and talk to visitors, and distribute type, and curry water, and saw wood, and read the proofs, and correct the mistakes, and hunt the shears to write editorials, and dodge the bills, and dun delinquents, and take cussings from the whole force, and tell our subscribers we need money. We say that we've no business to make mistakes while attending to these little matters, and getting our living on gopher tail soup flavored with imagination, and wearing old shoes and no collar, and a patch on our pants, and obliged to turn a smiling countenance to the man who tells us our paper isn't worth $1 anyhow, and that he could make a better one with his eyes shut. —Leman (Iowa) Globe.

Japp Schoop, on trial for the murder of Anton Schilling, was convicted at Philadelphia of murder in the first degree. Schoop has feigned ignorance of the English language and deafness, but heard and understood the verdict and exclaiming "Oh, God!"

All the white miners to the number of several hundred employed in the Dunsmire coal mines at Comox British Columbia have struck. The troubles arose from the employment of some Chinese at the mines. The miners demanded that the Celestials be discharged, which was refused.

CHRIST'S WRITING.

Tracing in the Dust The Words Hypocrisy and Forgiveness.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 17.—Dr. Talmage preached this morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle on the subject, "The Literature of the Dust."

Text: John viii, 6: "Jesus stooped down and wrote on the ground."

A Mohammedan mosque stands now where once stood Herod's temple, the scene of my text. Solomon's temple had stood there, but that Nebuchadnezzar thundered it down. Zorobabel's temple had stood there, but that had been prostrated. Now we take our places in a temple that Herod built because he was fond of great architecture and he wanted the proceding temple to seem insignificant. Put eight or ten modern cathedrals together and they would not equal that structure. It covered nineteen acres. There were marble pillars supporting roofs of cedar and silver tables on which stood golden cups, and there were carvings exquisite and inscriptions resplendent, glittering balustrades and ornamented gateways. The building of this temple kept ten thousand workmen busy forty-six years. In that stupendous pile of pomp and magnificence sat Christ, and a listening throng stood about him, when a wild disturbance took place. A group of men are pulling and pushing along a woman who had committed the worst crime against society. When they have brought her in front of Christ, they ask that He sentence her to death by stoning. They are a critical, merciless, disingenuous crowd. They want to get Christ into controversy and public reprehension. If he say, "Let her die," they will charge him with cruelty. If he let her go, they will charge him with being in complicity with wickedness. Whichever way he does, they would howl at him. Then occurs a scene which has not been sufficiently regarded. He leaves the lounge or bench on which he was sitting and goes down on one knee or both knees, and with the forefinger of his right hand he begins to write in the dust of the floor, word after word. But they were not to be diverted or hindered. They kept on demanding that he settle this case of transgression, until he looked up and told them that they might themselves begin the woman's assassination, if the complainant who had never done anything wrong himself would open the fire. "Go ahead, but be sure that the man who flings the first missile is immaculate." Then he resumes writing with his fingers in the dust of the floor, word after word. Instead of looking over his shoulder to see what he had written the scoundrel skulked away. Finally the whole place is clear of pursuers, antagonists and plaintiffs, and when Christ has finished this strange chirography in the dust, he looks up and finds the woman all alone. The prisoner is the only one of the court room left, the judges, the police, the prosecuting attorney having cleared out. Christ is victor, and he says to the woman, "Where are the prosecutors in this case? Are they all gone? Then I discharge you. Go and sin no more." I have always wondered what Christ wrote on the ground. For do you realize that is the only time that he ever wrote at all? I know that Eusebius says that Christ once wrote a letter to Abgarus, the king of Edessa, but there is no good evidence of such a correspondence. The wisest being the world ever saw and the one who had more to say than any one who ever lived, never writing a book or a chapter, or a page or a paragraph or a word on parchment. Nothing but this literature of the dust, and one sweep of a brush or one breath of a wind obliterated that forever. Among all the rolls of the volumes of the first library founded at Thebes, there was not one scroll of Christ. Among the seven hundred thousand books of the Alexandrian library, which by the infamous decree of Caliph Omar were used as fuel to heat the four thousand baths of the city, not one sentence had Christ penned. Among all the infinitude of volumes now standing in the libraries of Edinburgh, the British museum, or Berlin or Vienna, or the learned repositories of all nations, not one word written directly by the fingers of Christ. All that he ever wrote, he wrote in dust; uncertain, shifting, vanishing dust.

My text says he stooped down and wrote on the ground. Standing straight up a man might write on the ground with a staff, but if with his fingers he would write in the dust, he must bend over. Aye, he must get, at least, on one knee or he cannot write on the ground. Be not surprised that he stooped down. His whole life was a stooping down. Stooping down from castle to barn. Stooping down from celestial homage to mobocratic jeer. From residence above the stars to where a star had to fall to designate his landing place. From heaven's front door to the world's back gate. From writing in round and silvered letters of constellation and galaxy on the blue scroll of heaven, to writing on the ground in the dust, which the feet of the crowd had left in Herod's temple. If in January you have ever stepped out of a prince's conservatory that had Mexican cactus and magnolias in full bloom, into the outside air 10 degs. below zero, you may get some idea of Christ's change of atmosphere from celestial to terrestrial. How many heavens there are I know not, but there are at least three, for Paul was "caught up into the third heaven." Christ came down from highest heaven to the second heaven and down from second heaven to first heaven, down swifter than meteors ever fell, down amidst stellar splendors that himself eclipsed through clouds, through atmospheres, through appalling space, down to where there was no lower depth. From being waited on at the banquet of the skies to the broiling of fish for his own breakfast on the banks of the lake. From emblazoned chariots of eternity to the saddle of a mule's back. From homage cherubic, seraphic, arc angelic, to the paying of sixty-two and a half cents of tax to Cæsar. From the deathless country to a tomb built to hide human dissolution. The uplifted wave of Galilee was high, but he had to come down, before with his feet, he could touch it, and the whirlwind that rose above the pillow was higher yet, but he had to come down, before with his lip he could kiss it into quiet. Bethlehem a stooping down. Nazareth a stooping down. Death between two burglars a stooping down. Yes, it was in consonance with humiliations that had gone before and with self abnegations that came after, that on that memorable day in Herod's temple he stooped down and wrote on the ground.

Whether the words he was writing were in Greek or in Latin, or Hebrew, I cannot say, for he knew all those languages. But he is still stooping down and with his finger writing on the ground; in the winter, in letters of crystals; in the spring, in letters of flowers; in summer, in golden letters of harvest; in autumn, in letters of fire on fallen leaves. How it would sweeten up and enrich and emblazon this world, could we see Christ's caligraphy all over it! This world was not flung out into space thousands of years ago and then left to look out for itself. It is still under the divine care. Christ never for a half second takes his hand off it, or it would soon be a shipwrecked world, a defunct world, an absolete world, an abandoned world, a dead world. "Let there be light" was said at the beginning. And Christ stands under the wintry skies and says, Let there be snowflakes to enrich the earth; and under the clouds of spring, and says, Come ye blossoms and make redolent the orchards; and in September dips the branches into the vat of beautiful colors and swings them in the hazy air. No whim of mine is this. "Without him was not anything made that was made." Christ writing on the ground! If we could see his hand in all the passing seasons, how it would illumine the world! All verdure and foliage would be allegoric and again we would hear him say as of old, "Consider the lillies of the field how they grow:" and we would not hear the whistle of a quail or the cawing of a raven or the round delay of a brown thresher, without saying, "Behold the fowls of the air, they gather not into the barns, yet our heavenly Father feedeth them;" and a Dominic hen of the barn yard could not cluck for her brood, but we would hear Christ saying as of old, "How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings;" and through the redolent hedges we would hear Christ saying, "I am the rose of Sharon;" we could not dip the seasoning from the salt cellar without thinking of the divine suggestion, "Ye are the salt of the earth, but if the salt have lost its savor, it is fit for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men." Let us wake up from our stupidity and take the whole world as a parable. Then if with gun and pack of hounds we start off before dawn and see the morning coming down off the hills to meet us, we would cry out with the evangelist, "The day spring from on high hath visited us;" or caught in a snow storm, while struggling home, eyebrows and beard and apparel all covered with the whirling flakes, we would cry out with David, "Wash me and I shall be whiter than snow." In a picture gallery of Europe there is on the ceiling an exquisite fresco, but people having to look straight up, it wearied and dizzied them, and bent their necks almost beyond endurance, so a great looking glass was put near the floor and now, visitors only need to look easily down into this mirror and they see the fresco at their feet. And so much of all the heaven of God's truth is reflected in this world as in a mirror and the things that are above are copied by things all around us. What right have we to throw away one of God's bibles, aye, the first Bible he ever gave the race? We talk about the Old Testament and the New Testament, but the oldest Testament contains the lessons of the natural world. Some people like the New Testament so well, they discard the Old Testament. Shall we like the New Testament and the Old Testament so well as to depreciate the oldest, namely, that which was written before Moses was put afloat on the boat of leaves which was calked with asphaltum; or reject the Genesis and the Revelation that were written centuries before Adam lost a rib and gained a wife? No, no; when Deity stoops down and writes on the ground, let us read it. I would have no less appreciation of the Bible on paper that comes out of the paper mill, but I would, urge appreciation of the Bible in the grass, the Bible in the sand hill, the Bible in the geranium, the Bible in the dust. Some one asked the ancient king whether he had seen the eclipse of the sun. "No," said he, "I have so much to do on earth, I have no time to look at heaven." And if our faculties were all awake in the study of God we would not have time to go much further than the first grass blade. I have no fear that natural religion will ever contradict what we call revealed religion. I have no sympathy with the followers of Aristotle, who after the telescope was invented, would not look through it, lest it contradict some of the theories of their great master. I shall be glad to put against one lid of the Bible the microscope, and against the other lid of the Bible the telescope.

But when Christ stooped down and wrote on the ground, what did he write? The Pharisees did not stop to examine. The cowards, whipped of their own consciences, fled pell mell. Nothing will flay a man like an aroused conscience. Dr. Stevens, in his "History of Methodism," say that when Rev. Benjamin Abbott, of olden times, was preaching, he exclaimed: "For aught I know there may be a murderer in this house," and a man rose in the assemblage and started for the door and bawled aloud, confessing to a murder he had committed fifteen years before. And no wonder these Pharisees, reminded of their sins, took to their heels. But what did Christ write on the ground? The bible does not state. Yet, as Christ never wrote anything except that once, you cannot blame us for wanting to know what he really did write. But I am certain he wrote nothing trivial, or nothing unimportant. And will you allow me to say that I think I know what he wrote on the ground? I judge from the circumstances. He might have written other things, but kneeling there in the temple, surrounded by a pack of hypocrites, who were a self appointed constabulary, and having in his presence a persecuted woman who, evidently, was very penitent for her sins, I am sure he wrote two words, both of them graphic and tremendous and reverberating. And the one word was Hypocrisy and the other word was Forgiveness. From the way these pharisees and scribes vacated the premises and got out into the fresh air, as Christ, with just one ironical sentence, unmasked them, I know they were first class hypocrites. It was then as it is now. The more faults and inconsistencies people have of their own, the more severe and censorious are they about the faults of others. Here they are—twenty stout men arresting and arraigning one weak woman. Magnificent business to be engaged in. They wanted the fun of seeing her faint away under a heavy judicial sentence from Christ, and then after she had been taken outside the city and fastened at the foot of a precipice, the Scribes and Pharisees wanted the satisfaction of each coming and dropping a big stone on her head, for that was the style of capital punishment that they asked for. Some people have taken the responsibility of saying that Christ never laughed. But I think as he saw those men drop everything, chagrined, mortified, exposed, and go out quicker than they came in, he must have laughed. At any rate, it makes me laugh to read of it. All of those libertines dramatizing indignation against impurity. Blind bats lecturing on optics. A flock of crows on their way up from a carcass, denouncing carrion. Yes, I think that one word written on the ground that day by the finger of Christ was the awful word Hypocrisy. But I am sure there was another word in that dust. From her entire manner, I am sure that arraigned woman was repentant. She made no apology, and Christ in no wise belittled her sin. But her supplicatory behavior and her tears moved him, and when he stooped down to write on the ground, he wrote that mighty, that imperial word Forgiveness. When on Sinai God wrote the law, he wrote it with finger of lightning on tables of stone, each word cut as by a chisel into the hard granite surface. But when he writes the offense of this woman he writes it in dust, so that it can be easily rubbed out, and when she repents of it, oh! he was a merciful Christ! I was reading of a legend that is told in the far east about him. He was walking through the streets of a city and he saw a crowd around a dead dog. And one man said, "What a loathsome object is that dog!" "Yes," said another, "his ears are mauled and bleeding." "Yes," said another, "even his hide would not be of any use to the tanner." "Yes," said another, "the odor of his carcass is dreadful." Then Christ, standing there, said: "But pearls cannot equal the whiteness of his teeth." Then the people, moved by the idea that any one could find anything pleasant concerning a dead dog, said: "Why, this must be Jesus of Nazareth." Reproved and convicted they went away. Surely this legend of Christ is good enough to be true. Kindness in all his words and ways and habits. Forgiveness! Word of eleven letters and some of them palm branches. Better have Christ write close to our names that one word, though he write it in dust, than to have our name cut into monumental granite with the letters that the storms of a thousand years cannot obliterate. Bishop Babington had a book of only three leaves. The first leaf was black, the second leaf red, the third leaf white. The black leaf suggested sin, the red leaf atonement, the white leaf purification. That is the whole story. God will abundantly pardon.

I must not forget to say that as Christ stooping down, with his finger wrote on the ground, it is evident that his sympathies are with this penitent woman, and that he has no sympathy with her hypocritical pursuers. Just opposite to that is the world's habit. Why didn't these unclean Pharisees bring one of their own number to Christ for excoriation and capital punishment? No, no; they overlook that in a man which they dominate in a woman. And so the world has had for offending women, scourges an objurgation, and for just one offense, she becomes an outcast, while for men whose lives have been sodomic for twenty years, the world swings open its doors of brilliant welcome, and they may sit in legislatures and senates and parliaments or on thrones. Unlike the Christ of my text, the world writes a man's misdemeanor in dust, but chisels a woman's offense with great capitals upon ineffaceable marble. For foreign lords and princes, whose names cannot even be mentioned in respectable circles abroad, because they are walking lazarettoes of abomination, our American princesses of fortune wait, and at the first beck sail out with them into the blackness of darkness forever. And in what are called higher circles of society there is now not only the imitation of foreign dress and foreign manners, but an imitation of foreign dissoluteness. I like an Englishman and I like an American, but the sickest creature on earth is an American playing the Englishman. Society needs to be reconstructed on this subject. Treat them alike, masculine and feminine crime. If you cut the one in granite cut them both in granite. If you write the one in dust, write the other in dust. No, not says the world, let woman go down and let man go up. What is that I hear plash ing into the East River at midnight, and then there is a gurgle as of strangulation, and all is still. Never mind! It is only a woman to discouraged to live. Let the mills of the cruel world grind right on!

But while I speak of Christ of the text, his stooping down writing in the dust, do not think I underrate the literature of the dust. It is the most solemn and tremendous of all literature. It is the greatest of all libraries. When Layard exhumed Nineveh he was only opening the door of its mighty dust. The excavations of Pompeii have only been the unclasping of the lids of a volume of a nation's dust. When Admiral Farragut and his friends, a few years ago, visited that resurrected city, the house of Balbo, who had been one of its chief citizens in its prosperous days, was opened, and a table was spread in that house which eighteen hundred and ten years has been buried by volcanic eruption, and Farragut and his guests walked over the exquisite mosaics and under the beautiful fresco, and it almost seemed like being entertained by those the eighteen centuries ago had turned to dust. Oh, this mighty literature of the dust! Where are the remains of Sennacherib and Attila and Epaminondas and Tamerlane and Trojan and Philip of Macedon and Julius Cæsar? Dust! Where are the herbes who fought on both sides at Chæronea, at Hastings, at Marathon, at Cressy, of the 110.000 men who fought at Agincourt, of the 250,000 men who faced death at Jena, of the 400,000 whose armor glittered in the sun at Wagram, of the 1,,000 men under Darius at Arbella, of the 2,641,000 men under Xerxes at Thermopylæ? Dust!

Where are the guests who danced the floors of the Alhambra, or the Persian palaces of Ahasuerus? Dust! Where are the musicians who played, and the orators who spoke, and the sculptors who chiseled, and the architects who built in all the centuries except our own? Dust! The greatest library in the world, that which has the widest shelves and the longest aisles and the most multitudinous volumes and the vastest wealth, is the underground library. It is the royal library, the continental library, the hemispheric library, the planetary library, the library of the dust. And all these library cases will be opened, and all these scrolls unrolled, and all these volumes unclasped; and as easily as in your library or mine we take up a book, blow the dust off of it, and turn over its pages, so easy will the Lord of the Resurrection pick up out of this library of dust every volume of human life, and open it and read it and display it. And the volume will be rebound, to be set in the royal library of the King's palace, or in the prison library of the self destroyed. Oh, this mighty literature of the dust! It is not so wonderful after all that Christ chose, instead of an inkstain impressionable sand on the floor of an ancient temple, and instead of a hard pen, put forth his forefinger with the same kind of nerve and muscle and bone and flesh as that which makes up our forefinger, and wrote the awful doom of hypocrisy and full and complete forgiveness or repentant sinners, even the worst.

And now I can believe that which I read, how that a mother kept burning a candle in the window every night for ten years, and one night very late, a poor waif on the street entered. The aged woman said to her, "Sit down by the fire," and the stranger said, "Why do you keep that light in the window?" The aged woman said: "That is to light my wayward daughter when she returns. Since she went away ten years ago, my hair has turned white. Folks blame me for worrying about her, but you see I am her mother and sometimes, half a dozen times a night, I open the door and look out into the darkness and cry, 'Lizzie!' But I must not tell you any more about my trouble, for I guess, from the way you cry, you have trouble enough of your own. Why, how cold and sick you seem! Oh, my! can it be? Yes, you are Lizzie, my own lost child. Thank God that you are home again!" And what a time of rejoicing there was in that house that night! And Christ again stooped down and in the ashes of that hearth, now lighted up not more by the great blazing logs than by the joy of a reunited household, wrote the same liberating words that he had written more than eighteen hundred years ago in the dust of the Jerusalem temple. Forgiveness! A word broad enough and high enough to let pass through it all the armies of heaven, a million abreast, on white horses, nostril to nostril, flank to flank.

Sunday in Paris.

Every year Parisian tradespeople are becoming less disposed to Sunday shop-keeping, and there are even fewer artisans to be seen at work than was formerly the case, says a correspondent. The inhabitants of the proverbially lively city have not, of course, adopted the strict Sabbatarianism of their British neighbors, and it is even doubtful if many of them patronize the metropolitan churches on Sunday mornings. Their great object seems to be to extract as much rational amusement as possible out of the one day in the week when they are not tied down to their eternal desks, ledgers and counters. Dissapation there may be in some cases, and there is much ungodly revelry carried on during Sunday evenings in second class cafes, low dancing saloons and absinthe reeking resorts of the "Assommoir" type; but the respectable portion of the community takes its holiday in a decent fashion, and enjoys itself in a manner at which only the sourest disciple of Calvin or the most melancholy minded follower of Melancthon could cavil. Serious, steady and respectable Parisians walk leisurely in the Champs Elysees on Sundays, when the weather permits, or attend morning performances in the theatres or the afternoon concerts. Then they go home to dinner and have a family reunion, or wind up by a quiet game of cards or draughts in a favorite cafe.—Boston Herald.

Good Cheese.

In the little city of Geneva, Ga., a certain merchant employed as a clerk a good, clever, farmer's boy, who knew very little about different articles of merchandise and who had always greased his wagon with fresh tar. One day the merchant sent the new clerk into a side room where he kept groceries to attend to some matters there, and not seeing him again for some time he went in to see about him. He found him eating something with apparent relish and asked what he was doing. The clerk replied: "I have found a whole lot of little cheeses and they are mighty good with crackers." The merchant proceeded to investigate and was perfectly thunderstruck to find that the boy had eaten nearly a half box of axle greese, thinking it was cheese.

A Dog that Was a Joker.

There is a dog in Orlando, Fla., with a fine sense of humor, if this story is true as told by a local newspaper: His owner frequently gives him a piece of coin to carry along to market. A day or two ago he gave him a dollar, and the dog was trotting along when he saw a colored man approaching. He stopped a little distance in front of the darkey, dropped the dollar from his mouth to the sidewalk, and then walked to the edge of the pavement, apparently as if he cared nothing for the money. Mr. Darkey walked briskly up and was in the act of stooping to pick up the money, when the dog flew at him as if to bite, quickly seized the money, and trotted off with an air of "No, you don't" and overtook his owner.

Why He Experienced Regret.

From the Washington Post.

"I regret to see you with a bottle to your lips," said a pious-looking man to a member of Congress who was taking a nip on a Pullman before retiring. "Why, may I ask?" inquired the Congressman, with the tear of a lecture before his eyes. "Because, sir, there's so little chance of there being any left for me." The member took care of him.

MINNESOTA IN BRIEF.

A $5,000 creamery is to be in operation at Rock Creek by April 1.

The farmers in the vicinity of Plainview have formed a mutual fire insurance company.

Mrs. Bridget Milan, a resident of Marshan for 30 years, died of paralysis of the heart aged 69 years.

A movement is on foot to organize an old settlers' association in Winona county.

Joseph Richardson, one of the early settlers of Faribault, died recently, aged 75 years.

A temperance league has been organized at St. Cloud with a membership of over 100.

Joseph Strobinger, of Morris, now has a hairless head as the result of an explosion of gunpowder with which he was playing.

Some rascal helped himself to a horse on the street at Rochester, unhitching and unharnessing the animal from a team that was standing tied on a business street.

The old settlers of Wabasha county were at Plainview en masse it being their annual reunion. A very interesting programme was carried out followed in the evening by a banquet.

An unknown man was killed at Red Lake Falls by a snow plow on the Northern Pacific. The snow blinded the engineer and he did not know of the accident until the day after.

Mrs. Turner, wife of Dr. A. Turner, pastor of the Methodist church in Red Wing, fell upon the sidewalk recently, receiving injuries from which she is now lying in a very critical condition.

G. F. Meyers, of Featherstone township, Goodhue county, has commenced suit against the Red Wing and Duluth railroad to recover $6,200 damages caused by trespass on his property.

Peter Theis of Vermillion was knocked off the Milwaukee track at Etter by a passenger train. He escaped with a broken arm and a few bruises.

The public schools of Wabasha, which have been closed during the past three weeks on account of diphtheria, have been reopened, the crisis in the spreading of the disease having, it is thought, been passed.

G. W. Wright of Minnesota is a candidate for the position of civil service commissioner. He comes from Congressman Dunnell's district, and is a clerk in the treasury department.

The case of the state vs. Millie Bunnell was called at Duluth before Judge Jacques. Defendant waived examination, and was held in both cases to appear before the grand jury. Bail was increased to $3,000.

The Northwestern depot at Mankato Junction, four miles north of Mankato, burned. Agent Banks lived in it and lost most of his household effects. Total loss, $1,000; fully insured. The depot will be rebuilt.

The grounds have been selected for the Lutheran college at Albert Lea, and the directors are now engaged in looking up plans and specifications for the main building, which will be erected this year. About $18,000 will be expended on the main part of the building.

The Nickerson House was burned to the ground at Owatonna. The fire caught in the office and it was impossible to save the building. The building was owned by Charles E. Nickerson. Loss $3,000, insured for $2,000.

The Northfield city council having revoked the liquor license of F. A. Brockhoff & Co., proprietors of the California wine house, for selling on Sundays and to habitual drunkards, the mayor has been notified to appear at Faribault to show cause why a temporary injunction should not be served on the council.

The United States mail route between Sauk Center and Grove Lake has been discontinued. A petition is now being circulated, and receiving hundreds of signatures, asking of the United States government that the line be re-established. It is thought that the line will be re-established again soon.

Chairman Seeback, of Goodhue county, is in receipt of a letter written by the commissioner of Indian affairs, stating that there is at present no appropriation available for relieving the needs of the destitute Indians living on Prairie Island. Unless some appropriation is secured their support will devolve on Goodhue county, which our citizens consider would be an injustice.

There is considerable enthusiasm and excitement in Wabash, Winona and Olmsted counties over the many conversions brought about by the "Banded Evangelists" or "Praying Band." At Elgin they converted one hundred, at Viola fifty, St. Charles one hundred, while at Dover the whole town has turned in and joined the ranks, and satisfactory results are being accomplished here. The band will spend two weeks at Plainview.

The question of who shall be postmaster at Plainview under the new administration has been the leading question for some weeks, there being seven or eight applicants, two of whom are ladies. It appears that the matter is about settled, a petition being circulated for the appointment of A. J. Carroll, which shows every business house in town, with the exception of two, regardless of politics. Mr. Carroll served this capacity for twelve years previous to the present administration and is a very efficient official.

HOUSEHOLD.

Hints for the Home.

Tea and coffee stains should be taken out of linen while yet wet. Hold them over a bowl and pour boiling water through them.

Boston cooking schools, having graduated 1,800 girls during the year. "The Chicago Tribune" raises the important question, "Can they cook?"

The market is asking us for granulated butter, says Mr. Gould, and if we will fill the boxes with the best granulated butter, and then take a butter ladle and smooth it all slick, we have lost that granulated surface and lost a point with the buyer.

It is said that a certain cure for a felon is to wind a cloth loosely about the finger, leaving the end free. Pour in common gunpowder till the affected part is entirely covered. Keep the whole wet with strong spirits of camphor. Another species of felon is quickly suspended by twisted hemp.

Two pairs of stockings may be made of three old pairs. The long hosiery of the day will bear having the heel and sole cut out and then be ample in length. A new heel and sole may be cut from the third pair, and neatly fitted in; if the seams are carefully and closely overcast, the most fastidious need not object to them or ordinary occasions.

Cold on the Chest.

For a cold on the chest there is no better specific for most persons than well-boiled or roasted onions. They may not agree with every one, but to most persons with good digestion they will not only be found to be a most excellent remedy for a cough, and the clogging of the bronchial tubes which is usually the cause of the cough, but if eaten freely at the outset of a cold they will break up what promised, from the severity of the attack, to have been a serious one.—Chicago Ledger.

Rump Steak, Victoria Style.

Cut two pounds of rump steak into pieces about four inches long and two inches wide, says the Table Talk, sprinkle with pepper and roll in finely chopped parsley. Put on each piece of steak a very thin slice of bacon, roll up and tie tightly with a twine. Put any pieces of suet that were left in a frying pan to melt, put the meat in the hot fat and brown quickly, then place the rolls in a saucepan. Add two tablespoonfuls of flour to the fat remaining in the pan, cook until a dark brown, add a pint of stock or water, stir continually until it boils, and strain over the rolls. Cover and simmer gently one hour. While this is cooking remove the stones from a dozen olives, throw them into boiling water, boil rappidly for five minutes, then throw them into cold water until the meat is done; arange the rolls neatly on a platter, remove the strings, throw the olives into the sauce bring quickly to boiling point, and pour round the rolls.

Grease Your Shoes.

Shoes that are worn regularly, if cared for, will last much longer than if neglected, as is too often the case. A French kid shoe, if carelessly cared for, will not look as well nor last as long as one of an inferior quality that is looked after properly. When shoes are taken off they should be thoroughly brushed, to remove all dust that invariably collects in the creases, smoothed out with the hand and placed away in a shoebag or box away from the dust, and when wanted for use they can be taken out ready for wear. Where there is not a box or bag for the purpose a closet is the next best thing. Shoes will last much longer if, when new, they are rubbed with castor oil. Hold them in front of a fire and rub the oil well into the leather. The oil makes the leather pliable, fills up the pores and prevents it from cracking. Where boots are worn every day once a fortnight is not often to oil them. At first the oil, after standing, will give them a gray look, but when dressed it gives them a nice soft finish.

Practical Points.

From the Christian Union.

The most valuable goods, it is said, are are done up in the smallest parcels, so sometimes the most helpful suggestions are in the fewest words. The following paragraphs have been picked up from various sources, and are offered as a nosegay from an old-fashioned garden:

A man must ask leave of his stomach to be happy.

Salt fish of any kind is quickest and best freshened by soaking in sour milk.

Fish may be scaled much easier by dipping into boiling water about a minute.

In watering plants, put a teaspoonful of ammonia into water once a week.

Ripe tomatoes will remove ink-stains from white cloth and also from the hands.

A teaspoonful of turpentine boiled with white clothes will aid the whitening process.

Boiled starch is much improved by the addition of salt a little or dissolved gum-arabic.

Windows should be opened at both top and bottom in order to secure proper ventilation.

To attempt hard work or close study within an hour after eating invites derangement of the digestive organs.

Because the air is invisible it is no reason why pure air is not as essential to good health as are wholesome food and drink.

After the latter date it took $1,000 in Confederate money to buy a $1 greenback.

A Kansas paper says that prairie dogs make excellent eating, though there is a prejudice against their meat as food. Two of them were lately killed for a family that was short of meat, and they were fried for supper. The family being ignorant of what they were, thinking they were cotton-tail rabbits, ate heartily of them, and pronounced them the finest they had over eaten. Enough fat came from the two little animals to make almost a teacupful of oil.

The phonograph is serving a number of uses. One instrument concealed under the coat was discovered to be employed surreptitiously in stealing the score of a new opera; it was ejected. Many phonographs, it is said, are being employed by a number of actors and actresses as automatic teachers of elocution. Through the instrument they obtain an exact idea of their vocal expressions, and learn by means of mimicry the precise qualities of their tones.

Gen. H. M. Hunt, who died suddenly at Washington recently, was easily the ablest artillery officer in the United States army during the past fifty years, and was recognized the world over as among the foremost in that branch of the military service. He achieved distinction in the war with Mexico. Early in the war of the rebellion he was made chief of artillery in the Army of the Potomac. He did magnificent service in that position in the great artillery duel at the battle of Gettysburg and contributed much to the federal victory in that critical battle.

An old man sauntered into the Circuit Court, San Francisco, and at once attracted attention on account of a great growth of hair on his head and face. He was approached by a reporter, to whom he explained that his name was George Story and that he was eighty-nine years old. He left Nantucket Island in 1840 for California, and expected to return in a year or to. Before leaving he told his relatives that he would not use a pair of scissors on his hair or a razor on his face till he returned. He has not been home since, and as he has never worn his hair, which is coal black, represents a growth of forty years.

Washington Budget.

The news from Washington of Secretary Vilas' decision in the contested case of Hyde & McDonald vs. Eaton & Merritt caused considerable excitement at Duluth, especially among parties interested in iron lands. The decision that Sioux scrip located on unsurveyed land, in which it is not shown that the location was made for the benefit of the Indians will affect quite a number of titles.

Deputy United States Marshal Willis of Missouri, has arrived in Washington with Judge Peden of St. Clair county in custody. Several months ago a warrant was sworn out against the judge for refusal to levy a special tax to pay interest on railroad bonds. He had many friends, and the United States authorities encountered trouble in arresting him. Finally strategy was resorted to. The marshal heard that the judge was fond of fox hunting, and he induced the farmers to give a big circle hunt. When the event came off the judge was present in all his glory. While the round-up was in progress Marshal Willis decided to round up the judge. Choosing a moment when he was separated from his friends the marshal accosted him. The judge jumped from his mule and made for the brush. Willis fired four shots at him, and finally captured him. The judge is now in jail at Washington.

Calendar of Casualties.

A big rainstorm in Shelby county, Ala., ended with a tornado. The track of the storm is some distance from any railroad, and the particulars received are meager. The path of the tornado was twenty miles in length and crossed a rather thickly settled country. A large number of houses were unroofed or blown down, cattle and horses killed, and a number of people badly injured. It is reported that five or six persons were killed outright. The damage is estimated at $100,000.

One of the tallest offices buildings in America collapsed at Chicago. A number of workmen rushed out just in time to escape being crushed under the mountain of wreckage. The Owings block is the ruin. It was a beautiful Gothic structure, fourteen stories high, situated at the corner of Dearborn and Adams street, just opposite the postoffice, in the center of the business district. The ten lower stores fell in, one after another, leaving the wall and four upper floors and the roof standing in a decidedly shaky condition. In the tenth story the tile flooring was defective or was damaged by the natural settling of the building. Without the slightest warning the great mass of tiles and girding forming the injured floors, crashed to the story below, carrying it with it, and the two together acting like a huge pile driver pounded a way for them to the bottom. About 125 workmen have been steadily engaged in the building, but being Sunday, less than a dozen were on hand. All were in the basement when an ominous cracking and tremendous crash was heard. No one stopped to enquire the cause, but rushed pell mell into the street. They were not a moment to soon. It is presumed that the settling of the building caused the first break. The tiles of which the floors are made fit together like keystones and depend on each for support. Any extension of the space confining them would tend to allow the entire mass to drop out. Notwithstanding the great height of the building, the land on which it stands it not more than fifty feet square. The design was to utilize every inch to the utmost.

Personal Gossip.

Mme. Diss de Bar, the spook medium, has sprung into notoriety again. The latest rumor is that she is once more hobnobbing Lawyer Marsh and that she has conveyed to him the intelligence that the spirits have sent him a message commending him to wed the spook princess. Lawyer Marsh's friends are horrified at the idea, and may take steps to stop it.

Crimes and Criminals.

A man named Cobberty stabbed another named Cooper in the abdomen at Bogemen, Minn., in a quarrel about a woman. The wound is not serious. Cobberty is in custody.

S. F. Higens, the absconder from Bevington, Iowa, was arrested at Howards, Cal. Higens was agent for the United States Express company at Bevington, and on Jan 19 disappeared, $2,000 short in his accounts

It is rumored in Memphis that the arrest of the persons who planned and aided in the assassination of Hon. John M. Clayton at Plummerville, Ark., will soon be accomplished. One of the suspected parties belongs to a family whose reputation extends beyond the limits of Arkansas, being well known throughout the country, and it is due to his prominence that officials de'er making an arrest while endeavoring to establish to a certainty what, up to the present time, is only a well grounded suspicion of guilt.

James Elliston, a prominent cattle man and proprietor of the Cimmaron ranch, one of the largest in Western Kansas, became involved in a quarrel with C. L. Baldy was on familiar terms with his wife and accused him of it. They were parted by friends, but later the quarrel was renewed, and Baldy, who in the meantime had armed himself with a revolver, shot Elliston three times, death resulting almost instantly. The feeling against the murderer is very bitter. He claims that he acted in self-defense.

A well-dressed man called at the money brokerage office of James Walsh & Son, at 5 Wall street, and desired to exchange, some Italian bank notes for American money, but on Mr. Walsh's scrutinizing the notes and intimating a doubt as to their genuineness the man dashed out of the office and fled. He was pursued, but succeeded in escaping in the crowd on Broadway. He left behind a satchel full of the notes which proved to be clever counterfeits. Detectives have been out on the case.

Keya-Paha, one of the frontier counties of Nebraska, is in the hands of a vigilance committee said to number 500 men. They have a man named C. M. Clay and several others suspected of running off horses and cattle, and it is feared they will be lynched before the committee can be brought under control. A man named Stewart mysteriously disappeared and it is suspected he fell a victim to the vigilantes. The governor refused to send militia to enforce a writ of habeas corpus issued by the judge of a neighboring county.

A peculiar suit, with singular incidents attached, was instituted in the East St. Louis city court. Frederick Harris, of Chicago, and Miss Margaret Byrne, of St Louis, entered into an engagement to marry, and Mr. Harris presented his finance with costly jewelry. Henry Wilkins, an uncle of Miss Byrne, discovered that Harris was a divorced man, and succeeded in annulling the engagement. Harris now sues to recover the jewelry given Miss Byrne, and the Wilkins family claim its value will not offset the royal entertainment Harris has been accorded at the Wilkins residence while visiting Miss Byrne.

In a camp near High Bridge, eighteen miles from Ashland, Wis., on the Central railroad, a man named Thomas Montgomery was assaulted and terribly mangled with an ax by Louis Burke, who inflicted half a dozen wounds on his head, shoulders and other parts of the body. The cutting occurred while the victim was asleep. No other parties were engaged in the melee. Burke was jealous of his wife. It is believed he intended to kill her, but did not dare to as sleeping inmates—employes of Burke—becoming conscious of what was going on in their presence interfered, and Burke left the camp and gave himself up to an officer in Mellen, confessing his crime. [illegible] Burke is in jail.

Mrs. Olive E. Friend, the Howards and the Halsteads are still in jail at Ann Harbor, Mich. A writ of habeas corpus was obtained for Mrs. Friend, [illegible] Detectives [illegible] of New York arrived for the purpose of taking the entire party East. A strong legal fight will be made to test the validity of the papers before they will be allowed to go. [illegible] of any of the charges.

Dr. Carey, county physician, went to the county poorhouse at Darlington, Wis., and amputated the frozen feet of a tramp who had been taken there on the 15th, and who is believed by the authorities to be a bad criminal or a remarkably reticent man. He refuses to divulge his name or birthplace, or give any information that might lead to his identification. While he was under the influence of chloroform his clothing was searched by the sheriff and $70 in cash found, and a carefully preserved copy of a Chicago paper of Feb. 9, 1888, giving a detailed account of the murder of the millionaire banker, Amos J. Snell. Some people believe that the tramp is the long lost Tascott.

Foreign Jottings.

The correspondent of the Petit Journal at St. Salvator, Congo, says that a courier has arrived at that place from the west coast, who states that a report is current there that Henry M. Stanley was killed in an engagement with natives near Mangamba. The courier reports that several instruments which have been identified as having belonged to Mr. Stanley have been sold by natives. The london papers place no credit in the report.

When the case of William O'Brien was resumed at Tralee in Ireland Mr. O'Brien refused to allow Mr. Healy, his counsel to apologize for the language the latter had used to Col. Warner during the progress of the case. Mr. O'Brien also declined to make any further defense against the charges brought against him under the crimes act. The magistrate thereupon sentenced Mr. O'Brien to six months' imprisonment without hard labor.

The Cologne Gazette, in an elaborate article on the White Book, recently issued, declares that independent reports of three German consuls at Samoa prove conclusively that the Samoan troubles were brought about by the illegal and overbearing action of the Americans there, and claims that the intervention of Germany has really brought peace to the islands. The article characterizes the White Book as bearing striking testimony to the wisdom and moderation of Prince Bismarck, and showing that Germany has no responsibility whatsoever to the disorders in the Samoan islands.

News in General.

This is to be the Cabinet of President Harrison, as the newspaper men make it:

James G. Blaine, Secretary of State; William Windom, Secretary of the Treasury; John Wanamaker, Postmaster General; J. W. Noble, Secretary of the Interior; W. H. H. Miller, Attorney General; John R. Thomas, Secretary of the Navy; Jeremiah M. Rusk, Secretarary of War; Warner Miller, Secretary of Agriculture.

Senator Mitchell of Oregon has introduced the following bill: That hereafter when any person entitled under existing law to hold homestead entry of 160 acres of surveyed land subject to homestead entry under existing law, he shall have the liberty and shall have the right to extend the boundaries of his claim over any resurveyed lands adjacent thereto to the extent of not exceeding eighty acres, and when such lands are included within government surveys the boundaries of his claim shall be adjusted in accordance with the government lines.

The unanimous opinion of the cattle and sheep men in Northern Montana is that stock in this region was never in finer condition than at present, the losses on these ranges have not been so small for any winter during the past ten years. Flock owners are looking for improved prices, both for sheep and wool, the present year. Settlers are beginning to arrive in large numbers. More government land has been filed upon in this vicinity during the past month than for the two entire years previous.

At all the masses at the Roman Catholic churches Feb. 18, an encyclical letter from the pope was read, in which the faithful are warned against avarice; against immoral tendencies in literature and the drama; and against materialism in thought, which breeds socialism, communism, nihilism, etc. The letter also condemns public schools, and says of them: "There is no ecclesiastical authority left in them; and during the years when it is most fitting for tender minds to be carefully trained in Christian virtue and the precepts of religion are for the most part unheard."

A special agent on timber depredations of the general land office and a clerk from the Indian bureau have been detailed to investigate the cutting of timber from the several Indian reservations under the jurisdiction of the La Pointe (Wis.) agency. The United States district attorney for the Northern Wisconsin district has been directed by the department of justice, in consequence of information furnished by the secretary of the interior, to institute criminal and civil proceedings against all persons found to have unlawfully cut or removed standing timber from any of the reservations. His attention is especially directed to alleged unlawful operations on the Fond du Lac reservation.

A Murderous Brute.

A heavy butcher knife with a blade ten inches long was the weapon with which Dennis Hurley tried to murder his paramour at 210 East Tenth street St. Paul, Minn. He held her with one hand with the other he hacked at her face and head, using the knife as he would a cleaver. At every blow the blade sank into the woman's flesh, clean to the bone. In the back of her head he cut two three-inch gashes, running diagonally across each other. He smote her across the right cheek, laying the jaw bone bare from the ear to the chin, and when she raised her right arm in the effort to shield her head the blade fell on her wrist, severing the arteries. Another blow chopped a huge chunk of flesh off her left elbow.

Six young men, who board in the house, came to the woman's rescue before the butcher had done a fatal job, and he turned on them. The first to grapple with Hurley was Man'ord G. Roger's an employe in the general offices of the Northern Pacific railroad. Hurley swung the knife and caught Rogers in the back of the head just behind the left ear, cutting into the bone and laying open four inches of the skull. Rogers staggered and the knife caught him again, leaving a three-inch wound horizontally across the forehead. Charles Leggo, another of the boarders, who is a printer recently arrived from Canada, had a piece clipped off one of the knuckles of his right hand. The six men soon overpowered Hurley and he ceased to resist. Policeman McEllistrum came in a moment later and took him off to the central station.

The deed was that of a frenzied man thirsting for revenge. Hurley is a powerful six-footer, with the marks of a brute and bully in his face. He is forty-two years of age, and a brushmaker by trade. He came to St. Paul from Chicago in June last with his woman victim, who has passed as his wife.

Of their previous history she would not talk, but Hurley says she formerly conducted a restaurant at 745 Indiana street, Chicago, where he met her first a year ago. She was then known as Mrs. Martin, and had just buried a man named Martin, with whom she had lived for seven years. After boarding at the restaurant for two weeks Hurley assumed a husband's functions without taking the trouble to get out a marriage license.

They have never lived pleasantly, but the woman says she feared to leave Hurley. When not in good humor he has been in the habit of beating her. She was wearied of his domineering and made up her mind to be rid of him. The boarding house was her property and she consulted T. K. Nafus, a lawyer at 105 East Seventh street, who came to the house yesterday and notified Hurley that he must leave her. That is what enraged Hurley and prompted him to assault her as he did.

The affair was witnessed by Miss Dunne, one of the boarders, who is employed in a millinery store on East Seventh street. The lawyer had not gone, and the other boarders had eaten supper and retired to their rooms up-stairs. Miss Dunne sat in the dining room. Hurley came out of the parlor in front, where he had the interview with Nafus, leaving the woman in there. For five minutes he paced through the dining room, back to the kitchen and out to the parlor in silence. [illegible] The house presented the appearance of a slaughter pen when it was all over. The carpets in the hallway and on the stairs were soaked with blood. [illegible] Doctors Murphy and Briggs, who were called immediately after the affray, dressed the wounds, none of which are fatal.

ANOTHER HOLOCAUST.

Sleeping Victims in a Hartford Seat to a Horrible Death.

HARTFORD, Conn., Feb. 18.—Just before dawn this morning a hotel with its sleeping people was shattered by a force not yet ascertained, and, straightway, in the darkness and ruin, men and women and children were being crushed and maimed and burned by flames. It was at the hour when the twilight of the coming day had worn away the night a bit and while the city slept, that the still buildings were shaken as if by earthquake, and the silent streets were startled by a sullen booming, as though of a monster explosion. Upon the moment persons in the section of the city near the capitol and the union depot were further startled by the sound of crashing walls and falling timbers, and the screams of women, and by men's hoarse shouts from the vicinity of High and Allyn streets, which had been the site of the Park Central hotel, but which had practically disappeared. Those who hurried to the spot found upon the site of the hotel a huge pile of stone and brick and splintered timbers, from which white clouds of steam rose up in the morning twilight, streaked and blackened by wreaths of smoke that rapidly grew dark and blacker and more dense. Then tongues of flame leaped here and there from out the ruin, and grew bolder and stronger until the ruin was a roaring heap—a grate where solid masonry held the fuel in. The stupefied beholders had then began to move, and the clangor of fire bells bore down upon the scene, while from untold sources came a throng that stayed not idly, curious by. There were

and then wild screams from out the ruin that made men's faces blanch and their arms grow strong with helpful impulse. The streams of water played upon the flames was carried up in steam that smothered all vision of the ruin, but the daylight grew apace, and soon the helpers at the scene of ruin could see back beyond the ruin the yawning floors of an annex to the building which had housed the help of the hostelry and which had been spared. A portion of the tier of rooms at the rear of the main building had remained standing, but the partitions had been torn away, and the rooms were opened to the air. The floors of many of them, partly giving away, had tumbled out the occupants and furniture upon the confused heap below. The explosion had demolished the staircase of this annex, but the frightened employes were taken out by the aeriel ladder, two or three excited ones, however, jumping and receiving slight injuries. With that unexplained rapidity with which news of disaster flies through a town, the tidings that men and women, and children too, were being seemed soon to have roused the whole city to the scene. The police pressed back the throngs, not more curious than willing to help; the firemen from every vantage ground were pouring floods of water upon the ruins. The flames had been mastered and sunk down from sight within the ruins, where yet the water hissed and seared among the hot stones and brick that rapidly cooled and burst and cracked with sullen sounds. Men of the hook and ladder trucks were impatient, waiting only until the ruins had so cooled as to render safe their efforts in the wreck, and so, as soon as possible, willing hands set about the herculean task of removing the immense mass of masonry and the crowds waited and watched with breathless suspense.

The lower floor of the spacious wool warehouse of H. C. Judd & Root was made a temporary morgue. Here Coroner Sperry, Medical Examiner Fuller and Assistant Wright, with other local physicians, were in attendance and here the bodies were taken as fast as recovered, and opportunity was given for identification by friends. Those not identified were taken in charge by the city and tenderly cared for in a room of the old city hall. The injured were promptly sent to the hospital. The recovery of bodies was slow, owing to the immense accumulation of debris, but at nearly regular intervals one or two bodies were found during the afternoon. When claimed by friends they were delivered to undertakers.

The magnitude of the calamity cannot be realized, and, in fact, its extent is not yet known. The register of the hotel has not been found, and Perry, the night clerk, is buried in the ruins. But from the best estimates that can be procured from the landlord and others it is probable that there were not far from fifty people in the hotel proper. Of these perhaps five may have escaped uninjured amid the confusion of the early morning hours, leaving forty-five to be accounted for. Ten are in the hospital, and at 11 p. m. sixteen dead bodies have been taken from the ruins, leaving nineteen still missing. But there may be several more than this. Andrew F. Whiting, actuary of the Hartford Life and Annuity Insurance company, and wife; Rev. Dr. Lavalette Perrin, agent of the Memorial Hall association, and wife, and Edward Perry, the night clerk, are known to be still in the ruins.

THE CAUSE OF THE DISASTER
